"Knowingly." --

Immigration judge erred when he ordered an alien to be removed pursuant to 8 U.S.C.S. § 1227(a)(6)(A), based upon a finding that the alien had knowingly committed voter fraud in violation of HRS § 19-3.5(2); the alien did not have the requisite mens rea to commit voter fraud under § 19-3.5(2) because, although she knowingly voted, she did not know at the time she voted that she was ineligible to do so. ## NOTES OF DECISIONS

In general 1

1. In general

The Cape Henlopen School District did not violate any criminal statutes when it offered a free pizza party for the school with the documented highest percentage of students whose parents voted in a district referendum. Nor did an alleged $5000 donation to Cape that paid for Cape's support of the referendum violate Delaware's Campaign Finance Act. Title 15, including, 15 Del. C. § 5105 criminalizes specified conduct by or toward election officers. No allegations regarding the conduct of or toward election officers arose in Cape Henlopen. A civil cause would be possible pursuant to 15 Del. C. § 5162 if the voter can allege that a person attempted to control the exercise of his or her right to vote. Because this statute creates a civil claim rather than a criminal offense, the Attorney General has no jurisdiction to enforce its provisions. Op.Atty.Gen 06-IB04, (March 23, 2006) 2006 WL 1242015

1. In general

Public officials, authorized by law, as well as the several candidates and the electorate, may report alleged violations of the Florida Election Code to an appropriate prosecuting attorney, who, upon subsequent investigation may take appropriate action as the Election Code and the authority of his office may authorize. Op.Atty.Gen., 072-331, Sept. 28, 1972.

The Florida Election Code imposes specific duties upon the supervisor of elections and other public officials, but enforcement of the election laws for which criminal sanctions are imposed lies with the appropriate prosecuting attorneys of the several counties and the determination of guilt in such cases rests with the judiciary. ▣ Subtitle 1. Elections

▣ Chapter 39A. Election Misconduct (Refs &amp; Annos)

→39A.1. Title and purpose—election officials defined

1. This chapter may be cited and referred to as the "Election Misconduct and Penalties Act".
2. The purpose of this chapter is to identify actions which threaten the integrity of the election process and to impose significant sanctions upon persons who intentionally commit those acts. It is the intent of the general assembly that offenses with the greatest potential to affect the election process be vigorously prosecuted and strong punishment meted out through the imposition of felony sanctions which, as a consequence, remove the voting rights of the offenders. Other offenses are still considered serious, but based on the factual context in which they arise, they may not rise to the level of offenses to which felony penalties attach. The general assembly also recognizes that instances may arise in which technical infractions of chapters 39 through 53 may occur which do not merit any level of criminal sanction. In such instances, administrative notice from the state or county commissioner of elections is sufficient. Mandates or proscriptions in chapters 39 through 53 which are not specifically included in this chapter shall be considered to be directive only, without criminal sanction.
3. For the purposes of this chapter, "election officials" include the state commissioner, the county commissioner, employees of the state commissioner and county commissioner who are responsible for carrying out functions or duties under chapters 39 through 53, and precinct election officials appointed pursuant to sections 49.12, 49.14, 49.18, and 53.23.

29 C.J.S. Elections, §§ 325, n.1.

CASENOTES

1. Scope of section

Scope of section. The language of this section is broad enough to embrace, and in fact does in ipsis verbis embrace, "any election held in this state." Gandy v. State, 82 Ala. 61, 2 So. 465 (Ala.1887). See also Anderson v. State, 72 Ala.187 (1882); Washington v. State, 75 Ala. 582 (1884).

2. "Election" defined

"Election" defined. The word "election" means the act of casting and receiving ballots, and the day and time of voting. State v. Tucker, 54 Ala.205 (Ala.1875).

3. The words "illegal or fraudulent" as used in this section are merely descriptive

The words "illegal or fraudulent" as used in this section are merely descriptive of the intent necessary for the commission of the offense. Wilder v. State, 401 So.2d 151 (Ala.Crim.App.1981), writ denied 401 So.2d 167, certiorari denied 102 S.Ct. 606, 454 U.S. 1057, 70 L.Ed.2d 595.

Clearly, the language of this section reflects a common understanding that "illegal or fraudulent voting" is voting more than one ballot for the same office, or attempting to vote when one is not entitled to do so. This section thus gives due notice of the criminal consequences of such action. Wilder v. State, 401 So.2d 151 (Ala.Crim.App.1981), writ denied 401 So.2d 167, certiorari denied 102 S.Ct. 606, 454 U.S. 1057, 70 L.Ed.2d 595.

A.C.A. § 7-1-103

1. Electioneering

Evidence in proceeding alleging abridgment of right to vote established that county election officials did not prohibit voters from carrying voting aids into polling place but only that officials complied with Arkansas statute prohibiting handing out or distributing of campaign literature within 100 feet of polling place on election day. A.C.A. § 7-1-103(9). McGruder v. Phillips County Election Com'n, 1988, 850 F.2d 406. Counties ⤵ 38

2. Waiver of secrecy

Where it was impossible in primary election contest to identify ballot of voter, whose vote was challenged on ground that he had voted in wrong precinct, because his ballot stub could not be found, court properly permitted voter to waive secrecy of his ballot and state what candidate he voted for. Wood v. Brown, 1962, 235 Ark. 258, 235 Ark. 500, 361 S.W.2d 67. Elections ⤵ 154(10)

3. Domicile

Intention of a person as to where he resides is a question of fact. Phillips v. Melton, 1953, 222 Ark. 162, 257 S.W.2d 931. Domicile ⤵ 11

Where contestee in primary election contest questioned votes of two voters, who were husband and wife, and proved that they had been living in another state for nine years before election, trial court properly refused to allow contestant to show that voters had subjective intent to maintain residence in county of election, since proffered proof would not have established voters' right to vote in that county. Wood v. Brown, 1962, 235 Ark. 258, 235 Ark. 500, 361 S.W.2d 67. Elections ⤵ 154(10)

In election contest involving office of school director, evidence was sufficient to support finding that certain voters had not abandoned domicile in school district, even though they were living in another city. Ark.Stats. §§ 80-311, 80-318, 80-321. Phillips v. Melton, 1953, 222 Ark. 162, 257 S.W.2d 931. Elections ⤵ 295(1)

4. Betting on elections

Exceptionally strong case is made in primary election contest when losing candidate proves that election judge bet on outcome in violation of statutes. Ark.Stats. §§ 3-704, 3-801 et seq., 3-1516. Wood v. Brown, 1962, 235 Ark. 258, 235 Ark. 500, 361 S.W.2d 67. Elections ⤵ 154(10)

Betting on results of elections, including primary elections, is illegal and void, Crawford & Moses' Dig. § 3890. Williams v. Kagy, 1928, 176 Ark. 484, 3 S.W.2d 332. Gaming ⤵ 5

Wagers upon elections, then pending, are calculated to endanger the peace and harmony of society, and have a corrupting influence on the public morals, and have uniformly been considered as contrary to sound policy. Jeffrey v. Ficklin, 1841, 3 Ark. 227, 36 Am.Dec. 456, Unreported. Elections ⤵ 315

5. Availability of ballots

When ballots are not available in primary election contest, electors may be called to testify for whom they voted. Wood v. Brown, 1962, 235 Ark. 258, 235 Ark. 500, 361 S.W.2d 67. Elections ⤵ 154(10)

6. Intimidation of voter

A.C.A. § 7-1-103

Where voter on entering polling place told election judge that she was going to vote for one candidate and election judge told her that her husband had voted for another candidate and that her candidate would "tear up our school" and, as a result, voter cast her ballot for candidate recommended by election judge, discarding her vote was proper. Ark.Stats. § 3-1415. Phillips v. Melton, 1953, 222 Ark. 162, 257 S.W.2d 931. Elections ⇨ 227(9)

7. Unlawful voting

Contention that voter improperly cast absentee ballot because he allegedly was not unavoidably absent from his precinct on election day was presented too late, where raised for first time on appeal and long after time for filing complaint in primary election contest. Wood v. Brown, 1962, 235 Ark. 258, 235 Ark. 500, 361 S.W.2d 67. Elections ⇨ 154(6)

8. Unofficial ballots

Complete lists of all primary election candidates for each state, district and county office, distributed at political meeting by defendant telling audience for whom to vote in each case, were unofficial "ballots" within statute prohibiting distribution of "ballots" outside of ballots ordered for use in election for purpose of instructing voters how to vote, notwithstanding that official ballots were printed and that lists were mimeographed, and that lists did not have official designation as ballot to be used in Democratic Primary appearing on official ballots, and that one office on list appeared at different place than on official ballot. Pope's Dig. § 4873. Branton v. State, 1949, 214 Ark. 861, 218 S.W.2d 690, certiorari denied 70 S.Ct. 155, 338 U.S. 878, 94 L.Ed. 538. Elections ⇨ 320

9. Offenses by officers

Granting of recount in primary election contest does not violate rule that voters are not to be disfranchised by misconduct of election official. Wood v. Brown, 1962, 235 Ark. 258, 235 Ark. 500, 361 S.W.2d 67. Elections ⇨ 154(2)

Kirby's Dig. § 2825 creates two separate offenses, one for making a false count of the ballots and one for falsely certifying the election returns. State v. Doughty, 1918, 134 Ark. 435, 204 S.W. 968. Elections ⇨ 314

Falsifying election returns and making a false count of votes held separate offenses under Acts 1909, p. 507, § 4, making it a felony to falsify returns or make a false count of ballots. Kelly v. State, 1912, 102 Ark. 651, 145 S.W. 556. Elections ⇨ 314

Under Acts 1909, c. 165, section 4, providing that any judge or clerk who shall falsify the "returns" of a primary election shall be deemed guilty of a felony, etc., the returns consist of the poll books in which is entered the certificate of the officer conducting the election, together with a list of voters and one or more of the tally sheets, which are required to be carefully enveloped, sealed and delivered to the officer or board designated by the statute. Kelly v. State, 1912, 102 Ark. 651, 145 S.W. 556. Elections ⇨ 314

Under the primary election law, Acts 1909, c. 165, section 4, the offenses of falsifying the returns of a primary election and of knowingly making a false count of the ballots cast are separate and distinct. Kelly v. State, 1912, 102 Ark. 651, 145 S.W. 556. Elections ⇨ 314

Kirby's Digest, § 1667, imposing a penalty upon any judge or clerk of any election who "shall neglect, improperly delay or refuse to perform any of the duties required by law," etc., is inapplicable to school elections not conducted under the general election law, as provided by Kirby's Digest, § 7591. Brown v. Haselman, 1906, 79 Ark. 213, 95 S.W. 136. Elections ⇨ 323

In a declaration against a judge of elections for the statutory penalty for permitting an elector to vote twice, it is sufficient to charge that he did so "intentionally, wrongfully, and from motives of partiality, contrary to the form," etc., without averring the name of the person for whom the elector voted. Kirkpatrick v. Stewart, 1858, 19 Ark. 695, Unreported. Elections ⇨ 323

In a declaration for a penalty, under Eng.Dig. c. 61, § 28, it is sufficient to charge that the defendant took out the ballots and counted them before the polls were closed and the poll books signed, "intentionally, knowingly, and contrary to the form," etc., without averring that he acted corruptly and maliciously. Kirkpatrick v. Stewart, 1858, 19 Ark. 695, Unreported. Elections ⇨ 323

A declaration in an action of debt against a judge of elections, under Eng.Dig. c. 61, § 28, to recover the penalty prescribed for neglect of duty and misbehavior in office in appointing a minor clerk, is sufficient if it charges that he did so "knowingly, willfully, wrongfully, and contrary to the form," etc., without charging that he did so corruptly and maliciously. Kirkpatrick v. Stewart, 1858, 19 Ark. 695, Unreported. Elections ⇨ 323

10. Transportation of ballots

Statute in effect at time of election did not criminalize allegedly improper transportation of ballots by sheriff who was candidate for reelection in contested race, but rather merely noted that sheriff running for reelection in contested election would be "disqualified" from carrying out duties to deliver election supplies; statute did not specifically prohibit any act on part of sheriff. A.C.A. § 7-5-211(a) (1996). State ex rel. Sargent v. Lewis, 1998, 979 S.W.2d 894, 335 Ark. 188. Elections ⇨ 314

Allegations that sheriff violated election laws by delivering ballots to precinct himself when he was candidate for re-election did not create forfeiture of office, by law, so as to support usurpation action, absent any actual conviction of election law violations. A.C.A. §§ 7-1-103(28, 29), 7-1-104, 7-5-211, 16-118-105. Sargent v. Foster, 1998, 966 S.W.2d 263, 332 Ark. 608. Sheriffs And Constables ⇨ 6

11. Sufficiency of evidence

In prosecution for introducing fraudulent ballots in primary election with intent to affect count or recount of ballots, evidence on questions whether defendant had clipped name of unopposed candidate for township committeeman from certain ballots, and had encouraged certain voter to mark ballot for certain candidates was insufficient for jury. Ark.Stats. § 3-1525. Williams v. State, 1953, 222 Ark. 458, 261 S.W.2d 263. Elections ⇨ 330

1. Vote buying

Evidence that defendant paid voter $50 to obtain voter's blank absentee ballot and absentee voter statement was sufficient to support defendant's conviction of paying or offering to pay voter for voting, though voter did not personally complete absentee ballot by marking her candidate selections. Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 11(c), 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973i(c). U.S. v. Campbell, 1988, 845 F.2d 782, rehearing denied, certiorari denied 109 S.Ct. 490, 488 U.S. 965, 102 L.Ed.2d 527. Elections ↻ 316

Where it had never been suggested that all or substantial number of contributors to political party made their contributions with end in view of having their money spent to violate election laws, court could not presume that they did so and disclosure of all contributors and amount of all contributions was not relevant or justified, even if prosecuting attorney's investigation of vote buying might be advanced if he knew that certain individuals had made contributions to account which prosecuting attorney sought to inspect and copy. Ark.Stats. § 43-801 et seq.; U.S.C.A.Const. Amends. 1, 14. Pollard v. Roberts, 1968, 283 F.Supp. 248, affirmed 89 S.Ct. 47, 393 U.S. 14, 21 L.Ed.2d 14. Elections ↻ 121(1)

Section 18, Act Feb. 5, 1913, Acts 1913, p. 74, making it unlawful to give or promise an office or anything of value for political support, aid, or vote of any person, held not to require the promise to be made to person to whom the office, etc., is to be given. Wright v. State, 1918, 133 Ark. 76, 202 S.W. 236. Elections ↻ 316

2. Intimidation and violence

The constitutional requirements that popular elections shall be "by ballot" and be "free and equal," Art. 3, secs. 2, 3, are violated by a systematic plan to coerce voters to deposit their ballots in such manner as to disclose their contents to bystanders. Jones v. Glidewell, 1890, 53 Ark. 161, 13 S.W. 723. Elections ↻ 320

The purpose of statute prohibiting distribution of ballots outside of ballots ordered for use in election for purpose of instructing voters how to vote, was to prevent intimidation of voters and use of undue influence in elections. Pope's Dig. § 4873. Branton v. State, 1949, 214 Ark. 861, 218 S.W.2d 690, certiorari denied 70 S.Ct. 155, 338 U.S. 878, 94 L.Ed. 538. Elections ↻ 320

The governor of a state is not "an officer of election," within the meaning of Act May 31, 1870, § 22, 16 Stat. 145, which makes it criminal for any "election officer" fraudulently to make any false certificate of the result of any congressional election. U.S. v. Clayton, 1871, 25 F.Cas. 458, 4 Chi.Leg.N. 50, 0 No. 14814. Elections ⇨ 322

4. Penalties and actions

Allegations that sheriff violated election laws by delivering ballots to precinct himself when he was candidate for re-election did not create forfeiture of office, by law, so as to support usurpation action, absent any actual conviction of election law violations. A.C.A. §§ 7-1-103(28, 29), 7-1-104, 7-5-211, 16-118-105. Sargent v. Foster, 1998, 966 S.W.2d 263, 332 Ark. 608. Sheriffs And Constables ⇨ 6

Kirby's Digest, § 1667, imposing a penalty upon any judge or clerk of any election who "shall neglect, improperly delay or refuse to perform any of the duties required by law," etc., is inapplicable to school elections not conducted under the general election law, as provided by Kirby's Digest, § 7591. Brown v. Haselman, 1906, 79 Ark. 213, 95 S.W. 136. Elections ⇨ 323

In a declaration against a judge of elections for the statutory penalty for permitting an elector to vote twice, it is sufficient to charge that he did so "intentionally, wrongfully, and from motives of partiality, contrary to the form," etc., without averring the name of the person for whom the elector voted. Kirkpatrick v. Stewart, 1858, 19 Ark. 695, Unreported. Elections ⇨ 323

A declaration in an action of debt against a judge of elections, under Eng.Dig. c. 61, § 28, to recover the penalty prescribed for neglect of duty and misbehavior in office in appointing a minor clerk, is sufficient if it charges that he did so "knowingly, willfully, wrongfully, and contrary to the form," etc., without charging that he did so corruptly and maliciously. Kirkpatrick v. Stewart, 1858, 19 Ark. 695, Unreported. Elections ⇨ 323

In a declaration for a penalty, under Eng.Dig. c. 61, § 28, it is sufficient to charge that the defendant took out the ballots and counted them before the polls were closed and the poll books signed, "intentionally, knowingly, and contrary to the form," etc., without averring that he acted corruptly and maliciously. Kirkpatrick v. Stewart, 1858, 19 Ark. 695, Unreported. Elections ⇨ 323

5. Federal law

The laws of the United States concerning elections at which congressmen are elected are paramount, and Mansf.Dig.Ark. § 2694, providing that "the judges of election shall securely envelop all the ballots which may have been received under seal, and return the same to the clerk of the proper county, which shall in no event be opened except in case of a contested election," cannot be held to justify the refusal of the clerk to produce the ballots before the grand jury of the United States, pending an investigation into alleged violations of federal election laws. In re Massey, 1890, 45 F. 629. Elections ⇨ 326

The crime of destroying the ballot box used and the ballot cast at an election for congressman and presidential electors can be punished by the state as well as the United States. Mason v. State, 1892, 55 Ark. 529, 18 S.W. 827. Elections ⇨ 325

The courts of the State have jurisdiction to punish the fraudulent destruction of ballots cast for electors of President and Vice President of the United States, notwithstanding a representative in congress is also voted for. Mason v. State, 1892, 55 Ark. 529, 18 S.W. 827. Elections ⇨ 325

6. Indictment

005873

A.C.A. § 7-1-104

An indictment under Kirby's Dig. § 2825, charging election judges with making a false count of ballots, is not insufficient because it fails to set out the particular manner in which the false count was made or the names of the particular voters whose ballots were miscounted. State v. Doughty, 1918, 134 Ark. 435, 204 S.W. 968. Elections ⤵ 328(3)

Such indictment held not insufficient because it fails to specify whether the ballots themselves were miscounted or whether there was a miscount of the number of votes. State v. Doughty, 1918, 134 Ark. 435, 204 S.W. 968. Elections ⤵ 328(3)

An indictment for making false election returns under Kirby's Dig. § 2825, need not allege that the false certificate was delivered to the election commissioners; such delivery not being essential to the offense. State v. Doughty, 1918, 134 Ark. 435, 204 S.W. 968. Elections ⤵ 328(3)

In prosecution under Kirby's Dig. § 2783, for suppressing certificate of nomination of a candidate for sheriff, indictment held to sufficiently charge that petition of necessary number of qualified electors was filed with defendants, election commissioners, and that they suppressed the same. State v. Hunter, 1918, 134 Ark. 443, 204 S.W. 308. Elections ⤵ 328(3)

An indictment under Kirby's Dig. § 2783, as to suppression of certificate of nomination, was sufficient although it did not show that certificate of nomination was authenticated otherwise than by signatures of electors in view of section 2777. State v. Hunter, 1918, 134 Ark. 443, 204 S.W. 308. Elections ⤵ 328(3)

7. Evidence

Convictions for giving false information about names to establish eligibility to vote and aiding and abetting others in that offense were supported by evidence that defendants completed absentee ballot applications in the names of other registered voters, that one of them forged voters' signatures on some applications and others marked some applications with X's even though voters were able to sign their own names, and that ballots were voted in favor of candidate for whom defendants were working, without knowledge or permission of the voters; evidence as to one defendant's intent was sufficient despite contention that she was trying to help registered voters obtain the absentee ballots. 18 U.S.C.A. § 2; Voting Rights Act of 1965, § 11(c, e), as amended, 42 U.S.C.A. § 1973i(c, e). U.S. v. Boards, 1993, 10 F.3d 587, rehearing denied, certiorari denied 114 S.Ct. 2674, 512 U.S. 1205, 129 L.Ed.2d 810. Elections ⤵ 329

In prosecution for introducing fraudulent ballots in primary election with intent to affect count or recount of ballots, evidence on questions whether defendant had clipped name of unopposed candidate for township committeeman from certain ballots, and had encouraged certain voter to mark ballot for certain candidates was insufficient for jury. Ark.Stats. § 3-1525. Williams v. State, 1953, 222 Ark. 458, 261 S.W.2d 263. Elections ⤵ 330

In a prosecution for making a promise as consideration for political support in violation of section 18, Act Feb. 5, 1913, Acts 1913, p. 74, evidence held to sustain a conviction. Wright v. State, 1918, 133 Ark. 76, 202 S.W. 236. Elections ⤵ 329

Evidence held insufficient to show that accused falsified primary election returns. Kelly v. State, 1912, 102 Ark. 651, 145 S.W. 556. Elections ⤵ 329

8. Instructions

In a prosecution for making a promise as consideration for political support in violation of section 18, Act Feb. 5, 1913, Acts 1913, p. 74, held that the court correctly interpreted the statute and correctly declared the law in its

1. Injunctions

The state, through its Attorney General, may maintain a bill in equity in its sovereign capacity to enjoin a conspiracy to commit illegal and fraudulent acts which will result in the pollution of the ballot box and the perversion of an election, though the acts charged if committed, constitute criminal offenses. *People v. The interest of the state in a pure election is not limited to the protection which may be afforded by the punishment of those, through criminal prosecutions, who violate the laws relating to elections by padding registration lists, permitting repeating, and falsifying election returns, but equity will afford protection by enjoining the crime. *People v. Irregularities or defects in the mode of calling, giving notice of, convening, holding, or conducting any general, primary, or congressional vacancy election authorized by law constitute no defense to a prosecution for a violation of this code. When an offense is committed in relation to any general, primary, or congressional vacancy election, an indictment, information, or complaint for such offense is sufficient if it alleges that such election was authorized by law without stating the call or notice of the election, the names of the judges holding such election, or the names of the persons voted for at such election. 1 MR. DICKSON: I am just glad to 2 have more of us.

3 MR. KLINER: Mr. Chairman,
4 Whereas the Election Assistance Commission
5 is an agency of the United States Federal
6 Government created by the Help America
7 Vote Act, and whereas, the working group
8 met in May, 2006, and heard an initial 9 verbal presentation of information to be 10 included in a report on voter fraud and 11 voter intimidation and made specific 12 recommendations for the content of the 13 report, whereas the voter fraud and 14 intimidation report was submitted to the 15 EAC on or about July, 2006, but was not 16 released to the public, whereas on or
17 about 2006, [REDACTED] wrote a letter
18 of complaint regarding the failure to 19 timely release the report, noting that 20 these issues are of utmost important to 21 the fair administration of elections, and 22 whereas the EAC released in December of

1 2006 a severely edited version of the
2 voter fraud and intimidation report to the
3 public, and whereas these issues of voter
4 fraud and intimidation have become the 5 justification for many states passage of 6 voter identification and citizenship laws,
7 now, therefore, be it resolved that the
8 Board of Advisors recommends to the United

10 it release the original voter fraud and 11 intimidation report to the public, and in 12 the alternative, be it resolved that the
13 Board of Advisors recommends to the United
14 States Election Assistance Commission that 15 it release the voter fraud and 16 intimidation report to the EAC Board of 17 Advisors for its review.

18           I would note that the period
19 after, and in the next to the last 20 paragraph, should be deleted and the 21 period, EAC was deleted. Those are typos
22 that are my fault.

1           Approved as to form by the

5           MS. ARNWINE: Yes, if I may. I
6 raised this issue yesterday, and I just 7 wanted to offer one clarification. The

9 2006. I did receive a response on October
10 12, 2006, to my letter, and the report was 11 released, to my best information, in 12 December.

13           The concern, basically, is one
14 of transparency, and I also would say I 15 think it goes a lot also to the 16 credibility of the EAC before the advocacy
17 community, that in serving on the working 18 group, it was my understanding that this 19 was an important function, to come up with 20 a good analysis of the real data and 21 evidence on voter fraud and voter
22 intimidation. And two very capable

005977

1 consultants had been hired to engage in
2 preparing that report, and it was our
3 understanding that the report would, in 4 fact, be submitted. And it was our 5 expectation that it would be released as 6 submitted.

7           Unfortunately, there was this 8 delay that raised the question within the 9 advocacy community of why the delay and it
10 was unclear why the report was not being 11 released immediately. That was 12 compounded, of course, by state
13 legislature that is engaging in a series
14 of strategy for adopting a series of 15 statutory provisions that, in fact, were 16 presuming fraud and other basis for their 17 putting together voter identification
18 laws, some of them very onerous and 19 onerous citizenship requirement laws.

20           As a consequence, one of our 21 concerns, and the reason I wrote the 22 letter is I felt the report needed to come

1 out, and it would be helpful to the 2 conversation of all of us who are in
3 active debate on these issues.

4           As you may recall, in late
5 October, the U.S. Congress and the House
6 had a huge fight on this very issue, a
7 very close vote on the issue of voter
8 identification. And, once again, the 9 issue of what role does it play in 10 deterring fraud was at the basis of the 11 contention.

12           Those who, of course, are pro
13 these laws believe very strongly that they 14 have that deterrent effect. There are so
15 much issues here, I won't try to do them
16 all, but what I will say is that I believe 17 that it is important to our role for the 18 EAC itself, in its issues of transparency,
19 to make sure that an issue this critical,
20 this important, this at the forefront of 21 the major debates out there in the field
22 on what is a fair electoral process, that

005979

1 this should have -- this report, at the
2 minimum, should have been presented to
3 this body, and for us to have had some
4 attempt to review it in its original form
5 and at a maximum, that it should have been 6 released to the public, that I have really
7 concerns about what has happened here.

8           I think that in the absence of 9 this body's voluntary releasing the report
10 to the field, that Foyer requests that 11 have not filed that will compel our
12 lawsuits that will follow will somehow
13 compel the release of this report, and 14 it's going to be embarrassing because 15 there shouldn't be anything for us to feel
16 that it should not be released.

17           If the body had felt that the 18 consultants, as was expressed yesterday,
19 over personalized their opinions within 20 the report, I think there's other ways
21 that could have been handled, but I do
22 have a problem with the withholding of the

1 document and of the subsequent what I
2 think will be embarrassment as we proceed
3 with these Foyer requests and other
4 attempts that groups are already
5 undertaking to obtain the original report.

6           And so I, therefore, made my 7 motion, I hope, in the best spirit to 8 acquire the original report, which I do
9 not have a copy of and I have not seen, so
10 I have no idea how it differs in total
11 substance, but I understand it differs
12 significantly from just the -- whatever
13 you call it. As everybody knows, the only 14 secret in D.C. is a syndicated secret, as 15 far as I understand, and I would like to 16 see the original report, and I think this 17 whole body should have that original
18 report.

19           MR. THOMAS: [REDACTED] is out of the 20 room so I will give him an opportunity to 21 speak when he gets back. Any other
22 discussion? Question?

1                   MR. CUNNINGHAM: Keith
2 Cunningham. Is it common practice to edit
3 reports prior to their release? I'm not
4 sure how the Commission works. Is that 5 germane to this particular report or have
6 you done it on other reports?

7                   MS. HILLMAN: We have had other
8 studies where we have received the 9 information from consultants that has 10 informed a report that the EAC releases.
11 So it's not the first time that we have 12 not released the full report that has come
13 in to us.

14                   MR. CUNNINGHAM: Was that the 15 situation with the provisional ballot
16 report?

17                   MR. WILKEY: That was the case
18 and others, and is certainly a part of how 19 we structure our contracts. When we 20 develop a contract with a consultant, we 21 ask them to research a specific issue.
22 In this particular case, it was a first

1 step effort of what we see as a long-term
2 process of studying the issue, looking at
3 what was out there in terms of available
4 information resources, what have you,
5 giving us the draft report.

6           That report was, of course, pre
7 decisional on our part. Let me add that 8 as part of this report, that the two 9 consultants, one -- and I will be very
10 frank with you, whose work I have greatly 11 admired over the years and whose
12 recommendation I did a significant amount
13 of research in the appendix of this 14 record, all of which in its entirety was 15 made available and is up on our web site
16 for everybody to see. There was a
17 tremendous amount of research effort, but 18 as you recall, and I didn't happen to be 19 in the room because we had that 20 simultaneous meeting both of your board
21 and Standards Board, but I am made to 22 understand that there was a status report

1 given on this very subject in which there
2 was a great deal of interest and a great
3 deal of discussion from various board
4 members about issues related to that
5 report.

6           And so, again, taking advice
7 from this board, as we're required to do
8 and we will do, we followed in that
9 direction and took this report. And staff
10 looked at it, presented it to the 11 Commission in the appropriate way, and put 12 it out to the public in December last 13 year, but that's how we developed these 14 contracts.

15           Certainly, there are other
16 reports that may come along that the 17 Commission may decide to publish in its 18 entirety, without adopting it, but making
19 it available or taking it, looking at it
20 as a draft, as is required by the 21 contract, and fashioning it into a
22 document that they believe has more value

1 to the public.

2           Let me add, as I said at the
3 beginning, this was the first step in an 4 effort that's going to go on. As part of 5 that report and part of the recommendation
6 in that draft report, by the way, which is 7 clearly stated in the record that we 8 issued, we have taken a number of those 9 recommendations and are moving forward in 10 that comprehensive process to reach out to 11 other people involved in this area to get 12 even more information.

13           So that's where we are, that is 14 what we did, and I will gladly answer any 15 other questions that you have.

16           MR. DEGREGORIO: Paul
17 DeGregorio. Let me add to what Tom has 18 said about these reports. You might 19 remember because I was present when this
20 body met back in May and had some concerns
21 about the reports that we issued about the 22 information that's contained in the

1 reports, and the research and information
2 that's contained to make sure that it's
3 accurate and that it's fair to all
4 concerned. And I think we have treated
5 this particular report no different than 6 the other reports that we received and the 7 research we received.

8           And Tom is exactly right, it was 9 a draft, and we did report to you -- [REDACTED]
10 [REDACTED] reported to this body back in May the 11 status of this particular report. But I
12 think it's always incumbent on the EAC
13 before we put our empamater (sic) on 14 whatever document we issue as a body to 15 make sure national information that we 16 would put out as a Commission is correct
17 and is fair to all parties concerned.

18           And in this particular case, we 19 know that DOJ had a concern about some of 20 the information that was provided to us
21 that they felt was inaccurate. So it was 22 issues like that that our general counsel

1 looked at the whole picture, and looked at 2 what the intent was from the beginning of 3 what this report was supposed to be, and 4 then came to the EAC with her research on 5 this, and with the document that we were
6 comfortable with that leads to the future
7 or that needs to be done in research in 8 this particular area.

9       And also as Tom said, included a lot
10 of information that's on our web site
11 where people can go and find detailed 12 reports and studies about voter fraud and 13 voter intimidation, very good studies,
14 very good information. We didn't take a 15 stand on those particular documents, but 16 we provided them as informational, as we 17 will continue to do.

18               MR. THOMAS: Jim Dickson, you
19 are back in the room. You are co-sponsor.
20 Would you like to speak to this
21 resolution?

22               MR. DICKSON: Yes. Thank you.

005987

1 Jim Dickson.

2           I support this resolution, but I
3 also support its underlying notion of 4 supporting transparency and openness. I
5 absolutely am certain in my own heart that 6 everyone on the Commissioner and staff are 7 doing the best that you can do under very 8 different circumstances in educating and 9 informing the country's debate, and 10 providing practical assistance to election
11 officials.

12           Unfortunately, it seems to me
13 you can say we receive this report without 14 saying we accept it. You can receive a 15 report without saying this is our 16 position. And I would encourage the 17 Commission to think that way because the 18 flip side of it is whenever a report is 19 issued that was paid for with public money
20 and something is redacted, it just sends 21 the paranoids through the roof. They are 22 probably going to go through the roof

005988

1 anyway, but we don't need to give them
2 ammunition.

3           There are many people of good
4 will, when they see a redacted report in 5 the public, it just raises doubt. They
6 don't live and breathe this very complex
7 topic the way we do. And when the 8 Commission sends out something that's
9 redacted and it raises doubt in the press,
10 it raises doubt amongst people of good
11 will, that is beginning to create an
12 absolutely erroneous perception, but I am
13 afraid a very real perception, that the 14 Commission is about supporting the status
15 quo and protecting the administration of 16 elections.

17           Now, I want to be clear, I think 18 that that view is wrong. It's wrong in 19 spirit, it's wrong based on the facts, but 20 I urge passage of this so that we don't -- 21 so that the Commission can be perceived as 22 doing the very valuable, open, hard work

005989

1 that the Commission is doing, and there is
2 no taint on it.

3 MR. THOMAS: Further discussion?
4 Mr. Overton.

5 MR. OVERTON: Thank you. I am
6 in favor of disclosure, I think, at the 7 very least to this Board of Advisors. My 8 understanding is that the Department of 9 Justice had access to report to review it.
10 Is that correct?

11 MS. QUINN: No. We had access
12 to the same draft report you did in May of 13 2006.

14 MR. OVERTON: So, basically,
15 only the Commissioners and their staffers
16 have had access to the report.

17 MS. HILLMAN: Clarification. I
18 believe it's correct that Mr. Dansanto was 19 a part of the working group.

20 MR. DONSANTO: I was a part of 21 the panel that was a reviewing panel.

22 MS. HILLMAN: I don't know, and

1 in the absence of the staff person who
2 worked on it, I don't know which documents
3 that group saw. And DOJ should answer for 4 itself whether or not DOJ saw any more of 5 the report than the working group did.

6 MR. DONSANTO: Craig

7 Donsanto, Department of Justice.

8 This is a developing project. It's a
9 long-term project. It is a complex
10 project. It seems to measure something
11 that I have been trying to study for most 12 of my life. It is not an easy subject.

13 I was invited along with several
14 other people to be a part of a review
15 panel on this. Included on this review
16 panel was Gary Weinberg used to be head of 17 the voting rights division, and several 18 other people with a background in this 19 subject. We were given a preliminary 20 statement or preliminary product of these 21 contractors to look at. And the purpose
22 of us looking at it was to determine

005991

1 whether it was accurate and something to
2 be acted upon, and we found this -- not
3 just myself, but the panel in general,
4 found that that the report was 5 preliminary, it was incomplete, in some
6 cases, it was conclusionary, in a couple
7 instances, it was not accurate, and that
8 it needed more work.

9           And as a result of that session,
10 which was part of the internal review of 11 contractors work, it was resubmitted for 12 further work.

13           On the related issue of Freedom
14 of Information Act, as I understand it, it
15 is one of the pre decisional documents.
16 It would not be discoverable under FOIA.

17           It is a preliminary draft so it
18 would be not be releasable. And if I can 19 answer any more questions about this 20 preliminary process that I was privileged
21 to be a small part of, I will be pleased
22 to, but that's kind of it.

005992

1           MS. ARNWINE: Let me be very
2 clear. I am talking about the document
3 that was submitted to the Commission on or 4 about July of 2006. And I have no idea if 5 your panel review was after that point or 6 before then.

7           MR. DONSANTO: Sounds about
8 right.

9           MS. ARNWINE: I just think that
10 raises so many other issues that I don't
11 even want to get into them today. But I
12 will say that it is important that we -- 13 on something this critical, it is 14 important, I think, that it had been 15 released. Because clearly if I had been 16 on the panel reviewing it in July, given
17 the differences that the Lawyers Committee
18 and DOJ has on some of these perceptions
19 of what's accurate and not accurate, we 20 might have had a different conclusion.
21           I just think that there's issues
22 here that are deep regarding the function

005993

1 of the EAC. And I do believe that there
2 are answers that we need to keep working
3 at, but I do think that it does not serve
4 this body well at all to be perceived in 5 any regard as suppressing information or 6 not sharing information with the public
7 that clearly would be informative to this 8 overall debate.

9 MR. THOMAS: Mr. Overton. You
10 had the floor when this exchange started.
11 Anything further?

12 MR. OVERTON: No. I think, at 13 the very least with regard to disclosure
14 to this body, I think I am in support of 15 the resolution.

16 MR. THOMAS: Cameron.

17 MS. QUINN: A couple things.
18 One going back to the issue of the when.
19 Craig, I could have sworn when we saw the 20 draft report in May, that you had just 21 been in the working group meeting.

22 MR. DONSANTO: That's accurate.

005994

1 MS. QUINN: So it's nowhere near
2 this July time frame.

3 MR. DONSANTO: Time passes when 4 you're having fun.

5 MS. QUINN: I have some vague
6 recollection, and it was a very balanced
7 group, but I don't recall offhand who was 8 in.

9 MR. DONSANTO: I believe that
10 the information that was released
11 contained the working groups identity of 12 all the people on the working group.

13 MS. QUINN: I thought it did.
14 It was a very balanced group of people on 15 both sides of the issue. I just don't
16 recall, and apparently no one from the EAC
17 does, who was on that working group.

18 MS. ARNWINE: Once again, the 19 question is in July, after the report was 20 issued, the working group was not 21 reconvened to review or to receive what 22 the final product was, to give any

1 analysis. And, of course, the role of the
2 working group is another one of my issues
3 here, but it was not reconvened to give
4 any input as to whether or not the report
5 was sufficient or if it had addressed the 6 concerns that had been raised in May. And 7 I just continue to say that I think this
8 was not handled in the best way, and that 9 there needs to be disclosure of this 10 information.

11 MS. QUINN: If I can just finish
12 out on saying on a completely different
13 subject, they have got four corrections on 14 typos I would like to suggest when it's 15 appropriate.

16 MS. HILLMAN: I just want to 17 state I think it's hard for all us here
18 from the EAC to recite dates and sequences
19 of events because the staff who worked on 20 this are not in this room.

21 Now, I for one am on record
22 saying that the EAC should have handled

005996

1 the time frame of our review and how we
2 expedited the information from once we
3 received, that clearly was not our finest
4 hour. It could not have been helped. I
5 am forever probably going to wonder what
6 would life have been like on this
7 Commission had we not had an FDE cap, had 8 we had a full budget the first year we 9 were in operation, if we could have been 10 able to operate at a level of capacity
11 that we know we need.

12           Be that as it may, we couldn't,
13 and so we were really ham strung this
14 summer by having one of our soldiers down
15 for a while, and we just didn't pick up
16 the ball fast enough. That's past tense.
17 There is not much we can do about that.
18 And so with respect to who saw what when
19 after the May working group, I can't shed
20 light on that.

21           With respect to when the people
22 who were quoted in sections of the 005997

1 information we received from the
2 consultants, I know that there, as a part
3 of our due diligence process, verification
4 of that information to see if, in fact, it
5 was an accurate reflection of the dialogue
6 and conversation that went on. How that 7 was done, I don't know. I don't know if
8 it was done over the phone or how staff
9 verified the information, but I do want to 10 also clarify to this body that information
11 we give the Board of Advisors is public
12 information. So it's not like we can give 13 you a document that we can't make public.

14                   MR. LEWIS: I have listened
15 to this discussion and I have struggled 16 with what's the appropriate role for the 17 Board of Advisors, and what really is the 18 business of the Commission itself. And if 19 we adopt this kind of resolution, then it
20 says to me that the contractors have more
21 authority than the Commissioners because 22 the contractors get to propose what they

1 propose, write what they write, and then
2 you don't have any ability at that point
3 to say, well, that's not our position, and 4 that's not where we went to recommend to 5 the public, and we don't find enough
6 supporting information or documentation or 7 we think it's too filled with personal or 8 anecdotal stuff for us to be able to 9 support it.

10           I will tell you, at least at the 11 election center when we deal with 12 contractors, they understand they are 13 submitting things outside, and that we may 14 or may not publish it in it's native
15 format. We may or may not share it with 16 others. And I'm going to guess that every 17 governmental office in this room does sort
18 of the same sort of thing.

19           This seems to me, with all due
20 respect to the strong feelings that I know
21 that are viewed in this kind of study and 22 the issues related to it, I think it's 005999

1 appropriate for us to have that discussion
2 within these walls, but not necessarily 3 whether or not this body ought to have the 4 ability to review the native format and
5 then tell the Commission how it's supposed
6 to react to that. I think that usurps the 7 authority of the Commission, and quite
8 frankly, I won't be for that.

9           MS. KAUFMAN: I would like to 10 move the previous question. It requires a
11 secretary takes a two thirds vote to pass.

12           MR. THOMAS: I guess that gets 13 us to all in favor, call it to question
14 all. Cutting off debate, the question to 15 cut off debate.

16           MS. QUINN: Mr. Chairman, can I
17 ask that we're going to vote on this and 18 there are typos.

19           MR. THOMAS: We're not voting on 20 this. We're voting on calling the 21 questions.

22           MS. ARNWINE: Unreadiness. I

1 would like to respond to the authority
2 question.

3           MR. THOMAS: The question's been 4 called. I'm sorry. I have to move to 5 that. All in favor of calling the 6 question to cut off debate, I. Opposed?
7 Motion carries.

8           Now, therefore, be it resolved,
9 I'm going to ask my parliamentarian to 10 take care of typos. We will take care of 11 those later.

12           Now, therefore, be it resolved
13 that the Board of Advisors recommends to 14 the United States Election Assistance
15 Commission that it release the original
16 voter fraud and intimidation report to the
17 public, and in the alternative be it
18 resolved that the Board of Advisors
19 recommends to the United States Election
20 Assistance Commission that it, the EAC,
21 release the voter fraud and intimidation
22 record to the EAC Board of Advisors for

1 it's review.

2 All in favor, say I. All
3 opposed, nay. Motion does not carry.

4 MR. CRANGLE: Mr. Chair, I think
5 I had received a proposed resolution, and
6 I have propose approached the committee
7 members and may I read it, because I don't
8 have copies for everyone.

9 MR. THOMAS: Please read it.

Subject Standards Board Bylaws Draft

Sheila,

Please find attached a draft of the bylaws. Because it is a draft, I erred on the side of being over-inclusive. In addition, you will see that I tracked changes instead of doing a strike-through, primarily because I made more changes than I anticipated, many of which were to the document's organization.

If you have any questions or would like assistance in creating an "changes at-a-glance" document, I will be in the office bright and early on Tuesday.

Enjoy the rest of your weekend!

However, we need to get copies of all of the same documents that were included in the notebook and house them in one place on the server. These are considered public documents, and we are obligated to provide them if requested. We just want to make sure we have access to them if we get requests. You might want to check with Joanna Tepper. When she moved the contract files to get the FY '07 drawers ready, I believe she noted that that particular binder was missing. At the very least, I know she came across a binder labeled "2 of x," but one or more in the series was missing.

All-

As everyone knows, we have a FOIA request which involves, in part, materials from the Eagleton/Moritz contract.

In an effort to pull these materials together I have gone to the EAC Contracts file (located outside of Tom's office) only to discover one of the binders is missing. The binder was there last week and is now missing.

If you have this Eagleton Contract Binder 1 (4 inches thick) please return to me ASAP.

Subject: RE: Federal Register liaison training workshop

We will be happy to discuss these issues and offer advice, especially if we can see concrete examples of materials with an explanation as to how they would apply to the regulated or affected parties.

One of the complexities of the modern Federal regulatory system is the often blurry line between traditional direct rulemaking action (rules of general applicability and legal effect applied to the public or a defined class) and other quasi-regulatory schemes set up by statute.

A non-traditional indirect regulatory system may be created through an extensive system of grant requirements that must be applied by the recipient to carry out a regulatory objective, or other cases where there is voluntary acceptance of broad Federal regulatory oversight by parties who receive a Federal benefit in return for compliance.

Where there is a one-off set of grant or program requirements, it is only necessary to have general set of grant/program regulations, which may include general reporting requirements. Then the specifics of the one-and-done grant application and administration process may be handled in a Notice. However, if the grant program requirements are extensive, on-going, and subject to regular updates, it may be more appropriate to codify all the requirements in the CFR.

For instance, a grant Notice should be a complete, self-contained document framed for one time actions (who is eligible, how to apply, how to administer and report back). A Notice can only be supplemented and corrected, but not amended in the manner of a codified regulation, whereas the CFR readily accomodates the amendment process for ongoing, evolving programs.

Similarly, the voluntary model of regulation includes something that might be called "Federal regulations once removed." The Federal standards may not be enforceable regulations in and of themselves, but once adopted by states, they take on regulatory effect at the state level. If the Federal model regulations or proto-regulations need to look and function like traditional regulations, then they may need to be included in the CFR.

Some of our guidance is voluntary, but it does have general applicability.

For example, we publish the Voluntary Voting Systems Guidelines, which are not requirements, but which many states by statute or rulemaking follow. Since states administer elections, the Federal government cannot require that they do so in a specific way in most cases. But if a state chooses to adopt the VVSG for their voting systems, their statute may require adherence to the guidance.

Another example is our voting system certification manual, which describes the processes voting machine manufacturers must go through to become EAC certified for use in Federal elections.

In addition, we provide funding to the states to replace their voting equipment and educate their voters. States have to comply with specific reporting requirements to receive the funds.

We also run a grant program that provides money to colleges and universities to encourage college-aged citizens to become poll workers.

I am sure there are other programmatic areas that we are considering including. Maybe a rundown of what other agencies typically include/do not include in the CFR would be helpful?

We are at 800 North Capitol Street, Suite 700 . If you take Metrorail to Union Station, you can walk down Massachusetts Avenue (past the Postal Museum and Capitol Brewing Company) to North Capitol Street . Turn right on North Capitol and walk one long block. Our building is at the corner of North Capitol and H Streets, on the left side as you walk north. You will recognize our building by the Au Bon Pain restaurant on the first floor.

I would like clarification of your question #3. Can you describe the manuals and program documents that you wish to publish in the CFR? I am asking because documents that do not impose requirements with general applicability and legal effect, and do not affect a rulemaking proceeding, should remain in the Notices section. I want to make sure I understand your

Mr. Giles,

Please find below a list of questions we have. If some of them are questions that should be directed to another department, please let me know to whom I should address them. I am sure other questions will come up as well, but we can address them in time.

- 1) Is there a Commission-structured federal agency that runs certification programs you can point to as a good example for structuring our parts and sub-parts? For example, is the FCC organized well? Should we follow the US Postal Commission's structure?
- 2) If something has been published in the Federal Register as a final version for notice and coment purposes, will we have to re-publish it once we have modified its organization for the CFR?
- 3) Do you have a checklist of things we should be doing when publishing manuals and program documents in the Federal Register for notice/comment purposes that will enable us to use the same publications for CFR purposes?
- 4) Can you explain the differences in the kinds of CFR officers? Liaison, Certifying, and Authorizing?
- 5) How much lead time does your office need to review a document and suggest changes?

6) What is your office's turnaround time once documents are submitted to your office for suggestions?

7) Do you recommend publishing large guidance materials in parts/subparts or in appendices? What do other agencies do? How do they accommodate for revisions to such guidance materials?

8) Our agency has statutory authority over laws that were previously under the purview of a different agency. How should we handle transfer of those regulations to our section? Is transfer necessary? Advisable?

9) Since we are a January agency, is it the case that anything we publish in the CFR this year will not be in hard copy until January, 2008, but will be available online before then?

10) Please outline the different kinds of publications agencies typically include in the CFR and how the structures and processes differ for each.

Also, is it possible to add Edgardo Cortes, Election Research Specialist, to the list of participants?

As you can see, we have a lot of questions as we are new to this process!

Thank you,

Subject Moving regulations to new CFR chapter

Hello, Tamar. I checked the Department of Homeland Security reorganization to see whether I could find an example of regulations transferred from one CFR chapter to another. However, DHS did not do it that way. They added regulations to title 6 part by part.

I talked to my supervisor, Jim Wickliffe, and he recommended the other option that we discussed in yesterday's workshop. That is, the other agency could simply remove regulations from its chapter, and you could add the new regulations (in their entirety) in your chapter. It could be done in separate final rules - you would not have to do a joint rulemaking. If you wanted to have the final rules publish on the same day, EAC and the other agency could each reference the companion final rule in cover letters and coordinate the submission of the two final rules to OFR.

Let me know if you have questions -

You are not going to be able to place all of these word searches together. We need you to take each term on the list and do a search on it. You can only merge terms when it will not add other terms and therefore affect the outcome. For instance, vote and voter could probable be merged. I know this creates much much more work but it can't be helped. I would like you to pull the first 50 cases for each set of terms and send them to us with a short case summary (I know Westlaw lets you do a short case summary). From there we will have to read the cases and decide if we need any others in that search term.

Tova and Job,

Thank you for your feedback. There are two factors that went into my decision to perform the search in the manner I indicated which may have a bearing on whether you want me to do each search individually.

First, I checked with the Lexis representative at my school, who suggested the search methodology I used. She indicated that I would get the same results if I did the searches separately or together.

Second, as I am in the midst of finals, as you can imagine, I have limited time to devote to work. I will only be in the office two days in the next two weeks and will not be able to do much work from home. As a result, I probably won't be able to do the majority of the searches until just after Christmas if I am to do the each term separately. No. Please do the seperate searches as per my last instructions. If we don't get the results until after Christmas we will deal with it. I have performed both Westlaw and Lexis searches for years and I question the Lexis reps statement. I thought you were using Westlaw which tend to give a better result. In any case, we need the cases listed under each search term in groups of 50 with shor case descriptions.

Job,

I was using Lexis because I don't have inter-semester access to Westlaw. In addition, Westlaw does not allow me to restrict to specific dates. However, I called the dean of my school this morning and he granted me access to Westlaw for the break on a limited basis, so I will start fresh with the terms.

In the student version of Westlaw, I can choose cases in the past 3 or 10 years, but cannot select a date range. I will use the 10 year limitation unless you write to tell me otherwise.

I'll send results tonight.

Tamar:

I received your first Zip File today and there is another major problem. These look like Lexis and not Westlaw searches. The way this material is presented it is impossible to tell what is going on. I stated in my last e-mail that I wanted you to use Westlaw because you can pull up a short case evaluation for each case. These are no good to us without these evaluations. The evaluations list the parties, a short statement of facts and a short summary of the court's holding. I can only evaluate these cases with such a summary. Sorry to send you back to the drawing board but better now than after you substantially completed the assignment. If you can get these kind of evaluations with Lexis then go ahead but if not you need to use Westlaw.

Hi Job,

The Westlaw search took more than half an hour-I think because I can only download results into ASCII format. I did find a way to add a case summary to the Lexis output. I have attached the first search below. If this is useful to you, I would rather use Lexis because output into a PDF file is faster. If you'd still prefer me to use Westlaw, I'll have to figure out a way to shorten the search times.

Please use the 10 year range. The case summary is the most important item. In the US Courts version of Westlaw you can restrict by date.

Hi Job,

I anticipate sending 8-10 more emails. I can get through approximately 30 terms per day. If you would prefer that I hold on to a few days' worth of searches and send fewer emails, I am more than happy to do so.

I will not be sending another search email until the 27th as I will be working from home until then and do not have the means to send such large files when I am not at work. I can give you a better idea of how much longer it will take me at that point.

After I send the emails from home tonight or tomorrow, that should be all of the search terms you requested. Given the problems with sending emails, if you have any questions, think you are missing anything, or would like to review what I have sent, please feel free to call me. I will only be in the office on Mondays and Fridays, but I check email regularly.

Have a great weekend!

OFFICE OF MANAGEMENT AND BUDGET

September 23, 1992

POLICY LETTER 92-1

TO THE HEADS OF EXECUTIVE AGENCIES AND DEPARTMENTS

SUBJECT: Inherently Governmental Functions

1. Purpose. This policy letter establishes Executive Branch policy relating to service contracting and inherently governmental functions. Its purpose is to assist Executive Branch officers and employees in avoiding an unacceptable transfer of official responsibility to Government contractors.
2. Authority. This policy letter is issued pursuant to section 6(a) of the Office of Federal Procurement Policy (OFPP) Act, as amended, codified at 41 U.S.C. [[section]] 405.
3. Exclusions. Services obtained by personnel appointments and advisory committees are not covered by this policy letter.
4. Background. Contractors, when properly used, provide a wide variety of useful services that play an important part in helping agencies to accomplish their missions. Agencies use service contracts to acquire special knowledge and skills not available in the Government, obtain cost effective services, or obtain temporary or intermittent services, among other reasons.

Not all functions may be performed by contractors, however. Just as it is clear that certain functions, such as the command of combat troops, may not be contracted, it is also clear that other functions, such as building maintenance and food services, may be contracted. The difficulty is in determining which of these services that fall between these extremes may be acquired by contract. Agencies have occasionally relied on contractors to perform certain functions in such a way as to raise questions about whether Government policy is being created by private persons. Also, from time to time questions have arisen regarding the extent to which de facto control over contract performance has been transferred to contractors. This policy letter provides an illustrative list of functions, that are, as a matter of policy, inherently governmental (see Appendix A), and articulates the practical and policy considerations that underlie such determinations (see [[section]] 7).

As stated in [[section]] 9, however, this policy letter does not purport to specify which functions are, as a legal matter, inherently governmental, or to define the factors used in making such legal determination. Thus, the fact that a function is listed in Appendix A, or a factor is set forth in [[section]] 7(b), does not necessarily mean that the function is inherently governmental as a legal matter or that the factor would be relevant in making the legal determination.

5. Definition. As a matter of policy, an "inherently governmental function" is a function that is so intimately related to the public interest as to mandate performance by Government employees. These functions include those activities that require either the exercise of discretion in applying Government authority or the making of value judgments in making decisions for the Government. Governmental functions normally fall into two categories: (1) the act of governing, i.e., the discretionary exercise of Government authority, and (2) monetary transactions and entitlements.

An inherently governmental function involves, among other things, the interpretation and execution of the laws of the United States so as to:

(a) bind the United States to take or not to take some action by contract, policy, regulation, authorization, order, or otherwise;

(b) determine, protect, and advance its economic, political, territorial, property, or other interests by military or diplomatic action, civil or criminal judicial proceedings, contract management, or otherwise;

- (c) significantly affect the life, liberty, or property of private persons;
- (d) commission, appoint, direct, or control officers of employees of the United States; or
- (e) exert ultimate control over the acquisition, use, or disposition of the property, real or personal, tangible or intangible, of the United States, including the collection, control, or disbursement of appropriated and other Federal funds.

Inherently governmental functions do not normally include gathering information for or providing advice, opinions, recommendations, or ideas to Government officials. They also do not include functions that are primarily ministerial and internal in nature, such as building security; mail operations; operation of cafeterias; housekeeping; facilities operations and maintenance, warehouse operations, motor vehicle fleet management and operations, or other routine electrical or mechanical services.

The detailed list of examples of commercial activities found as an attachment to Office of Management and Budget (OMB) Cir. No. A-76 is an authoritative, nonexclusive list of functions that are not inherently governmental functions. These functions therefore may be contracted.

6. Policy.

(a) Accountability. It is the policy of the Executive Branch to ensure that Government action is taken as a result of informed, independent judgments made by Government officials who are ultimate accountable to the President. When the Government uses service contracts, such informed, independent judgment is ensured by:

- (1) prohibiting the use of service contracts for the performance of inherently governmental functions (See Appendix A);
- (2) providing greater scrutiny and an appropriate enhanced degree of management oversight (see subsection 7(f)) when contracting for functions that are not inherently governmental but closely support the performance of inherently governmental functions (see Appendix B);
- (3) ensuring, in using the products of those contracts, that any final agency action complies with the laws and policies of the United States and reflects the independent conclusions of agency officials and not those of contractors who may have interests that are not in concert with the public interest, and who may be beyond the reach of management controls otherwise applicable to public employees; and
- (4) ensuring that reasonable identification of contractors and contractor work products is made whenever there is a risk that the public, Congress, or other persons outside of the Government might confuse them with Government officials or with Government work products, respectively.

(b) OMB Circular No. A-76. This policy letter does not purport to supersede or otherwise effect any change in OMB Circular No. A-76, Performance of Commercial Activities.

(c) Drafting of Congressional testimony, responses to Congressional correspondence, and agency responses to audit reports from an Inspector General, the General Accounting Office, or other Federal audit entity. While the approval of a Government document is an inherently governmental function, its drafting is not necessarily such a function. Accordingly, in most situations the drafting of a document, or portions thereof, may be contracted, and the agency should review and revise the draft document, to the extent necessary, to ensure that the final document expresses the agency's views and advances the public interest. However, even though the drafting function is not necessarily an inherently government function, it may be inappropriate, for various reasons, for a private party to draft a document in particular circumstances. Because of the appearance of private influence with respect to documents that are prepared for Congress or for law enforcement or oversight agencies and that may be particularly sensitive, contractors are not to be used for the drafting of Congressional testimony; responses to Congressional correspondence; or agency responses to audit reports from an Inspector General, the General Accounting Office, or other Federal audit entity.

- 7. Guidelines. If a function proposed for contract performance is not found in Appendix A, the following guidelines will assist agencies in understanding the application of this policy letter, determining whether the function is, as a matter of policy, inherently governmental and forestalling potential problems.

(a) The exercise of discretion. While inherently governmental functions necessarily involve the exercise of substantial discretion, not every exercise of discretion is evidence that such a function is involved. Rather, the use of discretion must have the effect of committing the Federal Government to a course of action when two or more alternative courses of action exist (e.g., purchasing a minicomputer than a mainframe computer, hiring a statistician rather than an economist, supporting proposed legislation rather than opposing economist, supporting proposed legislation rather than opposing it, devoting more resources to prosecuting one type of criminal case than another, awarding a contract to one firm rather than another, adopting one policy rather than another, and so forth).

A contract may thus properly be awarded where the contractor does not have the authority to decide on the course of action to be pursued but is rather tasked to develop options to inform an agency decision maker, or to develop or expand decisions already made by Federal officials. Moreover, the mere fact that decisions are made by the contractors in performing his or her duties (e.g., how to allocate the contractor's own or subcontract resources, what techniques and procedures to employ, whether and whom to consult, what research alternatives to explore given the scope of the contract, what conclusions to emphasize, how frequently to test) is not determinative of whether he or she is performing an inherently government function.

(b) Totality of the circumstances. Determining whether a function is an inherently governmental function often is difficult and depends upon an analysis of the factors of the case. Such analysis involves consideration of a number of factors, and the presence or absence of any one is not in itself determinative of the issue. Nor will the same emphasis necessarily be placed on any one factor at different times, due to the changing nature of the Government's requirements.

The following factors should be considered when deciding whether award of a contract might effect, or the performance of a contract has effected, a transfer of official responsibility:

(1) Congressional legislative restrictions or authorizations.

(2) The degree to which official discretion is or would be limited, i.e., whether the contractor's involvement in agency functions is or would be so extensive or his or her work product is so far advanced toward completion that the agency's ability to develop and consider options other than those provided by the contractor is restricted.

(3) In claims adjudication and related services,

(i) the finality of any contractor's action affecting individual claimants or applicants, and whether or not review of the contractor's action is de novo (i.e., to be effected without the appellate body's being bound by prior legal rulings or factual determinations) on appeal of his or her decision to an agency official;

(ii) the degree to which contractor activities may involve wide-ranging interpretations of complex, ambiguous case law and other legal authorities, as opposed to being circumscribed by detailed laws, regulations, and procedures.

(iii) the degree to which matters for decision by the contractor involve recurring fact patterns or unique fact patterns; and

(iv) The contractor's discretion to determine an appropriate award or penalty.

(4) The contractor's ability to take action that will significantly and directly affect the life, liberty, or property of individual members of the public, including the likelihood of the contractor's need to resort to force in support of a police or judicial function; whether force, especially deadly force, is more likely to be initiated by the contractor or by some other person; and the degree to which force may have to be exercised in public or relatively uncontrolled areas. (Note that contracting for guard, convoy security, and plant protection services, armed or unarmed, is not proscribed by these policies.)

(5) The availability of special agency authorities and the appropriateness of their application to the situation at hand, such as the power to deputize private persons.

(6) Whether the function in question is already being performed by private persons, and the circumstances under which it is being performed by them.

(c) Finality of agency determinations. Whether or not a function is an inherently governmental function, for purposes of this policy letter, is a matter for agency determination. However, agency decisions that a function is or is not an inherently governmental function may be reviewed, and, if necessary, modified by appropriate OMB officials.

(d) Preaward responsibilities. Whether a function being considered for performance by contract is an inherently governmental function is an issue to be addressed prior to issuance of the solicitation.

(e) Post-award responsibilities. After award, even when a contract does not involve performance of an inherently governmental function, agencies must take steps to protect the public interest by playing an active, informed role in contract administration. This ensures that contractors comply with the terms of the contract and that Government policies, rather than private ones, are implemented. Such participation should be appropriate to the nature of the contract, and should leave no doubt that the contract is under the control of Government officials. This does not relieve contractors of their performance responsibilities under the contract. Nor does this responsibility to administer the contract require Government officials to exercise such control over contractor activities to convert the contract, or portion thereof, to a personal service contract.

In deciding whether Government officials have lost or might lose control of the administration of a contract, the following are relevant considerations: the degree to which agencies have effective management procedures and policies that enable meaningful oversight of contractor performance, the resources available for such oversight, the actual practice of the agency regarding oversight, the duration of the contract, and the complexity of the tasks to be performed.

(f) Management controls. When functions described in Appendix B are involved, additional management attention to the terms of the contract and the manner of performance is necessary. How close the scrutiny or how extensive or stringent the management controls need to be is for agencies to determine. Examples of additional control measures that might be employed are:

(1) developing carefully crafted statements of work and quality assurance plans, as described in OFPP Policy Letter 91-2 Service Contracting, that focus on the issue of Government oversight and measurement of contractor performance;

(2) establishing audit plans for periodic review of contracts by Government auditors;

(3) conducting preaward conflict of interest reviews to ensure contract performance in accordance with objective standards and contract specifications;

(4) physically separating contractor personnel from Government personnel at the worksite; and

(5) requiring contractors to (a) submit reports that contain recommendations and that explain and rank policy or action alternatives, if any, (b) describe what procedures they used to arrive at their recommendations, (c) summarize the substance of their deliberations, (d) report any dissenting views, (e) list sources relied upon, and/or (f) otherwise make clear the methods and considerations upon which their recommendations are based.

(g) Identification of contractor personnel and acknowledgment of contractor participation. Contractor personnel attending meetings, answering Government telephones, and working in other situations where their contractor status is not obvious to third parties must be required to identify themselves as such to avoid creating an impression in the minds of members of the public or the Congress that they are Government officials, unless, in the judgment of the agency, no harm can come from failing to identify themselves. All documents or reports produced by contractors are to be suitably marked as contractor products.

(h) Degree of reliance The extent of reliance on service contractors is not by itself a cause for concern. Agencies must, however, have a sufficient number of trained and experienced staff to manage Government programs properly. The greater the degree of reliance on contractors the greater the need for oversight by agencies. What number of Government officials is needed to oversee a particular contract is a management decision to be made after analysis of a number of factors. These include, among others, the scope of the activity in question; the technical complexity of the project or its components; the technical capability, numbers, and workload of Federal oversight officials; the inspection techniques available; and the importance of the activity. Current contract administration resources shall not be determinative. The most efficient and most effective approach shall be utilized.

(i) Exercise of approving or signature authority. Official responsibility to approve the work of contractors is a power reserved to Government officials. It should be exercised with a thorough knowledge and understanding of the contents of documents submitted by contractors and a recognition of the need to apply independent judgment in the use of these work products.

8. Responsibilities.

(a) Heads of agencies. Heads of departments and agencies are responsible for implementing this policy letter. While these policies must be implemented in the Federal Acquisition Regulation (FAR), it is expected that agencies will take all appropriate actions in the interim to develop implementation strategies and initiate staff training to ensure effective implementation of these policies.

(b) Federal Acquisition Regulatory Council. Pursuant to subsections 6(a) and 25(f) of the OFPP Act, as amended, 41 U.S.C. [[section]][[section]] 405(a) and 421(f), the Federal Acquisition Regulatory Council shall ensure that the policies established herein are incorporated in the FAR within 210 days from the date this policy letter is published in the Federal Register. Issuance of final regulations within this 210-day period shall be considered issuance "in a timely manner" as prescribed in 41 U.S.C. [[section]] 405(b).

(c) Contracting officers. When requirements are developed, when solicitations are drafted, and when contracts are being performed, contracting officers are to ensure:

(1) that functions to be contracted are not among those listed in Appendix A of this letter and do not closely resemble any functions listed here;

(2) that functions to be contracted that are not listed in Appendix A, and that do not closely resemble them, are not inherently governmental functions according to the totality of the circumstances test in subsection 7(b), above;

(3) that the terms and the manner of performance of any contract involving functions listed in Appendix B of this letter are subject to adequate scrutiny and oversight in accordance with subsection 7(f), above; and

(4) that all other contractible functions are properly managed in accordance with subsection 7(e), above.

(d) All officials. When they are aware that contractor advice, opinions, recommendations, ideas, reports, analyses, and other work products are to be considered in the course of their official duties, all Federal Government officials are to ensure that they exercise independent judgment and critically examine these products.

9. Judicial review. This policy letter is not intended to provide a constitutional or statutory interpretation of any kind and it is not intended, and should not be construed, to create any right or benefit, substantive or procedural, enforceable at law by a party against the United States, its agencies, its officers, or any person. It is intended only to provide policy guidance to agencies in the exercise of their discretion concerning Federal contracting. Thus, this policy letter is not intended, and should not be construed, to create any substantive or procedural basis on which to challenge any agency action or inaction on the ground that such action or inaction was not in accordance with this policy letter.
10. Information contact. For information regarding this policy letter contact Richard A. Ong, Deputy Associate Administrator, the Office of Federal Procurement Policy, 725 17th Street, N.W., Washington, DC 20503. Telephone (202) 395-7209.
11. Effective date. This policy letter is effective 30 days after the date of publication.

APPENDIX B

The following list is of services and actions that are not considered to be inherently governmental functions. However, they may approach being in that category because of the way in which the contractor performs the contract or the manner in which the government administers contractor performance. When contracting for such services and actions, agencies should be fully aware of the terms of the contract, contractor performance, and contract administration to ensure that appropriate agency control is preserved.

This is an illustrative listing, and is not intended to promote or discourage the use of the following types of contractor services:

1. Services that involve or relate to budget preparation, including workload modeling, fact finding, efficiency studies, and should-cost analyses, etc.
2. Services that involve or relate to reorganization and planning activities.
3. Services that involve or relate to analyses, feasibility studies, and strategy options to be used by agency personnel in developing policy.
4. Services that involve or relate to the development of regulations.
5. Services that involve or relate to the evaluation of another contractor's performance.
6. Services in support of acquisition planning.
7. Contractors' providing assistance in contract management (such as where the contractor might influence official evaluations of other contractors).
8. Contractors' providing technical evaluation of contract proposals.
9. Contractors' providing assistance in the development of statements of work.
10. Contractors' providing support in preparing responses to Freedom of Information Act requests.

11. Contractors' working in any situation that permits or might permit them to gain access to confidential business information and/or any other sensitive information (other than situations covered by the Defense Industrial Security Program described in FAR 4.402(b)).
  12. Contractors' providing information regarding agency policies or regulations, such as attending conferences on behalf of an agency, conducting community relations campaigns, or conducting agency training courses.
  13. Contractors' participating in any situation where it might be assumed that they are agency employees or representatives.
  14. Contractors' participating as technical advisors to a source selection board or participating as voting or nonvoting members of a source evaluation board.
  15. Contractors' serving as arbitrators or providing alternative methods of dispute resolution.
  16. Contractors' constructing buildings or structures intended to be secure from electronic eavesdropping or other penetration by foreign governments.
  17. Contractors' providing inspection services.
  18. Contractors' providing legal advice and interpretations of regulations and statutes to Government officials.
  19. Contractors' providing special non-law enforcement, security activities that do not directly involve criminal investigations, such as prisoner detention or transport and non-military national security details.

AGENCY:

Office of Management and Budget, Executive Office of the President, Office of Federal Procurement Policy.

ACTION:

Policy Letter on Inherently Governmental Functions.

SUMMARY:

The Office of Federal Procurement Policy (OFPP) publishes today the final version of a policy letter providing guidance to Executive Departments and agencies on (1) what functions are inherently governmental functions that must only be performed by Government officers and employees and (2) what contractible functions so closely support Government officers and employees in their performance of inherently governmental functions that the terms and performance of those contracts require closer scrutiny from Federal officials. This policy letter has been developed because executive agencies, members of Congress, the General Accounting Office, and the public have from time to time either requested guidance regarding, or inquired about, the propriety of awarding contracts for certain types of functions or administering contracts in certain ways. Previous guidance on this issue has also not been as detailed as that which we now provide.

SUPPLEMENTARY INFORMATION

Comments received. We received 34 comments in response to our proposed policy letter published in the Federal Register on December 16, 1991 (56 Fed. Reg. 65279): eight from industry or trade groups, four from private individuals, two from employee organizations, one from a Federally funded research and development center, and 19 from Government agencies.

1. Purpose of the policy letter. This policy letter on inherently governmental functions is being published to provide guidance on what kinds of functions, as a matter of policy, must be performed by officials of the Executive Branch of the United States and what kinds of functions may be performed by private persons under contract with the Federal Government.

Previous guidance on these matters that has been available to the Executive Branch has not been detailed and sometimes Federal agencies have permitted contractors to perform functions that should be performed by Government personnel. We now provide more detailed guidance.

2. Relationships of policy letter to other OFPP publications on service contracting. This policy letter is also one of several that the Office of Federal Procurement Policy (OFPP) has published recently that have focused on some aspect of service contracting in the Federal Government. At this time, OFPP has determined it is best to deal with individual aspects of service contracting rather than trying to publish comprehensive guidance in one document. We will consider collecting all of the guidance on service contracts in one document in the future.

Thus, we do not cover in detail in this policy letter such matters as cost effectiveness of contracting for services, conflicts of interest of service contractors, and management of service contracts. These issues are dealt with in OMB Circular No. A-76, Performance of Commercial Activities, August 4, 1983 (under revision); OFPP Policy Letter 89-1, Conflict of interest Policies Applicable to Consultants, 54 Fed. Reg. 51,805 (December 18, 1989); OFPP Memorandum for Agency Senior Procurement Executives, Government-Wide Guidance on Contract Administration (March 15, 1991); OFPP Policy Letter 91-2, Service Contracting, 56 Fed. Reg. 15110 (April 15, 1991); proposed OFPP Policy Letter 91-____, Past Performance Information, 56 Fed. Reg. 63988 (December 6, 1991); and proposed OFPP Policy Letter 92-____, Management of Service Contracting, 56 Fed. Reg. 66091 (December 20, 1991).

3. Relationship to OMB Circular No. A-76. One commenter asked that we make clear our apparent intent to clarify rather than alter the guidance originally found in OMB Circular No. A-76 on inherently government functions. This is our intent. No fundamental change is intended.

We have altered the form of the original Circular A-76 definition of an inherently governmental function in the interest of clarity. Specific examples cited in the original A-76 definition have been incorporated into Appendix A and a list of the general principles underlying the selection of the functions listed in that appendix has been added in their stead.

The terms "function" and "activity" as used in this policy letter and Circular A-76, respectively, are interchangeable.

The same commenter above suggested that we add a new Appendix C, containing a nonexclusive list of functions that are commercial activities that should be contracted. We have not adopted this suggestion because the scheme proposed is the same one we have implicitly adopted. The proposed Appendix C is nothing more than the list of examples of commercial activities found as an Attachment to Circular A-76. We do not believe it is necessary to incorporate that A-76 attachment in this policy letter. The fact that we have not provided this Appendix C thus should not be construed as narrowing the scope of functions that have been contracted in the past. Nonetheless, we have added language to [[section]] 5 to clarify the relationship between Circular A-76 and this policy letter on this point.

Another commenter stated that the relationship between this policy letter and Circular A-76 is unclear. This policy letter is to be the exclusive source of guidance on what constitutes, as a matter of policy, an inherently governmental function.

4. Libraries. Several persons questioned the inclusion of library operations as a ministerial function that should be contracted out in subsection 7(a) of the December version of the policy letter. The fact that employees render professional services in performing a function does not mean that the function in question is necessarily inherently governmental. In fact, the Government frequently seeks out contract services precisely because of the level of sophistication required to perform a particular function. On the other hand, agencies may determine that aspects of their library operations, such as handling certain types of information in certain circumstances, involve performance of an inherently government function. Therefore, we have removed the reference to libraries.

5. Contract audits for inspectors general. One commenter suggested that Federal inspector general (IG) work should be done by using Government resources, with exceptions justified on a case-by-case basis, unless specific technical expertise is needed temporarily and is not available within the Government. This suggestion was not adopted because (1) Congress has specifically authorized the use of contract auditors in [[paragraph]] 6(a) (9) of the Inspector General Act codified at 5 U.S.C. App. 3, and (2) financial and compliance audit activities are not considered inherently governmental functions.

Another commenter questioned whether subsection 12(g) of Appendix A pertaining to the determination of whether contract costs are reasonable, allocable, and allowable proscribes the use of contract audit services. It does not. The decision on what costs are reasonable, allocable, and allowable is ultimately a Government decision, but that decision may be based on recommendations made by contract auditors. Certified public accountants, for example, only render "opinions" and contracts sometimes provide that audit reports are advisory only. Moreover, the use of contract auditors has been authorized by Congress, as noted above.

6. Agency determinations. One commenter interpreted the policy letter as authorizing Federal managers to make a final determination on whether a function is an inherently governmental function, under this policy letter, without such determination's being subject to being overturned by the Office of Management and Budget (OMB) or being subject to a cost comparison study under Circular A-76. In general, agencies are expected to make their own determinations, subject to oversight by OMB. Language has been added to subsection 7(c) to clarify this point.
7. Agency discretion. One commenter questioned the need for the language in former subsection 7(e) regarding agency discretion to award nonpersonal service contracts. We agree it is unnecessary. It is already clear that awarding a contract is an agency responsibility.
8. Incorporation in OMB Circular No. A-76, other documents. Several commenters suggested that the policy letter be incorporated in Circular A-76, "Commercial Activities," currently being revised. We did not incorporate this suggestion because A-76 is already a lengthy document. Also, contracting for inherently government functions is indeed a consideration in contracting out, but it is not unique to the A-76 program. All Federal officials who contract for nonpersonal services must consider the problem of inherently governmental functions, and we thus believe separate guidance applicable to all such contracting, not just to nonpersonal service contracting in the A-76 context, is the better alternative. Other commenters urged that the policy letter be combined with one or more other OFPP policy letters, such as those on conflict of interest, service contracting, and past performance and published in a form other than a policy letter. This suggestion has merit but we believe it best to try to deal with discrete portions of service contracting rather than to try to deal with all facets of a complex problem at once, as discussed in point 2, above.
9. Agency discretion regarding resource allocation. One commenter suggested we should address the issues of the future balance between official and contractor workforce in the performance of "basic government work," the specific expertise needed to manage the contractor workforce now or in the future, where this expertise should be located, and the way in which it can be maintained. We believe this is a matter for agencies themselves to determine, given their knowledge of their mission, their resources, the kinds of services they wish to contract, and the size of their service contracting effort. We merely highlight the problem of lack of oversight as a loss of Government control and require agencies to be aware of their existing oversight responsibilities. They are, however, to use their own discretion to figure out how to manage their contracts.
10. Evaluation of proposals. One commenter believes there is an apparent conflict between former subsection 14(b) in Appendix and [[section]] 8 of Appendix B. There is no conflict as new subsection 12(b) refers to participation as a voting member on source selection boards only.
11. Appendix B controls. The same commenter also suggested that Appendix B should contain a discussion of possible controls that the Government should employ to prevent the functions listed there from being perceived as inherently government function. We do not believe this is necessary, as any function that is in Appendix B is by definition not an inherently governmental function.
12. Applicability to nonpersonal services. Three commenters questioned why the policy letter applies only to nonpersonal service contracts. Upon consideration, we have accordingly deleted the definition of "service contract" in [[section]] 5. No useful purpose is served by defining "personal services" differently from the FAR and no harm arises from having the policy letter apply to the minimal number of true personal services.

contracts. Personal service contracts that are really personnel appointments are excluded from the coverage of the policy letter. Thus, FAR 37.102(b) need not be amended as a result of this policy letter.

13. Subcontractors. Commenters questioned whether subsection 12(d) of Appendix A should apply to subcontractors. It does not and clarifying language has been added.
14. Supplies or services purchased by prime contractors. Some commenters questioned the apparent effect of subsection 12 in Appendix A of preventing contractors from buying supplies and services for their own account. It is not the intent of this policy letter to prevent contractors mess halls from buying food to be prepared for military personnel. Nor does it affect what or how contractors buy to be incorporated into supplies or services to be delivered to the Government. Similarly, contractors may purchase supplies or services for the Government while acting within reasonable Government guidelines. Section 12 is only meant to address the Government's direct acquisition of supplies or services.
15. Independent judgment. The emphasis placed on independent judgment by this policy letter does not preclude the wholesale adoption of contractor advice, opinions, recommendations, ideas, or conclusions. They merely may not be adopted, in whole or in part, without officials' first exercising independent judgment.
16. Duties of contracting officers. We have added language to [[section]] 8 to spell out the analytical steps to be following by contracting officers seeking to comply with this policy letter.
17. Risk of injury to the public. One commenter stated that the definition of an inherently government function does not clearly address the danger to the public interest when a function is contracted out and the public is at risk if contractors, such as fire fighters or military support contractors, fail or refuse to act in time of crisis. The risk of injury to the public is an important consideration. We believe, however that [[paragraph]] 7(b)(5) appropriately identifies this point as a consideration in determining whether a function is, as a matter of policy, an inherently governmental function. The decision to include several of the functions listed in Appendix A reflects an underlying concern for this risk.
18. Binding nature of decisions. This same commenter noted that it is an overstatement to say that the use of discretion (referred to in what is not subsection 7(a) of the policy letter) must have the effect of committing the Government to a course of action. This is because a scientific consulting firm, for example, could submit a study that would have a tremendous impact on regulations or other agency actions but would not necessary lead to a commitment to a course of action.

We have addressed the element of discretion in subsection 7(a) to convey the idea that the mere existence of the element of discretion is not determinative of whether, as a matter of policy, an inherently governmental function is involved. Moreover, it is useful to observe that a study hat has a tremendous impact is not per se a bad thing. A study may have that effect because of its great merit. We should be concerned, however, when a study is allowed to proceed to the point where alternative views, solutions, research, or conclusions, and so forth, cannot realistically be included or taken into account. In this case, the contractor has in effect made all important decisions. Section 7(b)(c) addresses this issue.

19. Federally funded research and development center (FFRDCs). One commenter stated that while profit-making contractors can perform functions listed in Appendix B, the policy letter should cross-reference FAR 35.107 pertaining to FFRDCs and "recognize less rigorous oversight." We have not adopted this suggestion. We do not agree that FFRDCs necessarily require less oversight. FAR Part 35 and that its provisions may suffice to enable satisfactory agency oversight of FFRDCs. Whether fewer or additional control measures are necessary to ensure agency control over FFRDCs is a matter for agencies to decide in the circumstances of each case.
20. Architect-engineer evaluation boards. This same commenter questioned whether [[section]] 3, which states that services obtained by personnel appointments and advisory committees are not covered by this policy letter, could be construed to prohibit private individuals appointed to architect-engineer source evaluation boards in accordance with FAR 36.602 from voting. To the extent such boards are advisory committees, the policy letter is not applicable to them. If they are not, the commenter makes an excellent point. FAR 36.602-4 makes clear that the agency is to make the final selection and FAR 36.602-3(d) provides for the evaluation board to set out in its report the considerations upon which its recommendations were based. This is an acceptable mechanism and we have accordingly revised subsection 12(b) of Appendix A and [[section]] 14 of Appendix B to make clear that it is selection of sources that is the most sensitive function. Contractor activities that result in recommendations and that explain how those recommendations were arrived at adequately preserve agency options. A related change has been made in subsection 7(f) stating that requiring contractors to explain how they arrived at their recommendations is another available control measure

21. Factors to consider in totality of the circumstances.

(a) Complexity and oversight. One commenter questioned the inclusion of [[paragraph]] 7(d)(2) of the proposed policy letter relating to the complexity of the task to be performed. Upon consideration, we conclude that complexity is better considered in conjunction with the provision that was at 7(d)(12) relating to oversight procedures, resources, and practices. We have amended paragraph 12 accordingly and moved it, as well as the provision in former [[paragraph]] 7(d)(4) relating to the duration of the contract, to new subsection 7(e), Post-award responsibilities. This was done to remove questions relating to contract oversight from the "totality of the circumstances" test. It is important to understand that, if an agency has inadequate oversight procedures or poor oversight practices, the underlying function of any agency contract affected by these deficiencies is not thereby transformed into an inherently governmental function. As the totality test focuses on the nature of the function in question and as there can be a transfer of oversight responsibility even if the underlying function is contractible, the issue of de facto transfer of control should therefore be dealt with elsewhere. (Note that a transfer of contract management responsibility to the contractor is explicitly not permitted by Appendix A, subsection 12(e).)

(b) Ultimate user of contractor work product. Several commenters questioned the inclusion of this factor at [[paragraph]] 7(d)(3) of the proposed policy letter. We agree it should be taken out. Who will use the contractor's work product is important and this has bearing on how much management attention to give to the contract, but it doesn't say anything about the nature of the underlying function or the adequacy of agency contract administration.

(c) Review of contractor action. The same commenter questions the advisability of including a factor (new [[paragraph]] 7(b)(5)) that relates to the finality of any contractor's adjudication of any claim and the type of agency review of contractor adjudications. We see no problem with agencies' providing for contractor adjudication of claims so long as citizens know that they have a right of recourse to agency decisionmakers if they are dissatisfied with the decisions of the contractor. (Note, however, that certain kinds of hearings may still not be eligible of any person for a security clearance, or hearings involving actions that affect matters of personal reputation or eligibility to participate in Government programs. See Appendix A, [[section]] 14.)

Thus, we distinguish between on the one hand, holding hearings and making recommendations and, on the other, retaining the authority to issue the final adjudicatory decision. Contractors may perform the former functions so long as there is adequate oversight, agencies retain the authority to issue the final decision, and the public has a right to insist that the agency make the final decision, if it so desires. This is easier to understand if one views the contractor's action as more of a advisory action than one that binds the claimant with only limited opportunities to change the result before the agency. Note that in the absence of an appeal by a claimant, the agency need not rule on each contractor decision or ruling. It should of course, inspect or sample contractor decisions or rulings from time to time to ensure that contractors comply with agency guidelines and procedures.

(d) Limited or extinguishing discretion. The same commenter noted that our speaking in terms of contractor limiting or extinguishing discretion in former [[paragraph]] 7(d)(5) could mistakenly create the impression that some of the Government's authority can be exercised by a contractor. The policy letter attempts to clarify this issue at subsection 7(a).

(e) Public perception. Several commenters questioned the inclusion of this factor at [[paragraph]] 7(d)(11) of the proposed policy letter, believing that public perception is too ambiguous a concept. We agree. A function can probably be analyzed in the light of other factors listed without the need to resort to the concept of perceptions. Appendix A of the policy letter is itself an up-to-date listing that already takes into account the factor of public perceptions. The paragraph has been deleted.

(f) Laws applicable to the Civil Service. Several commenters questioned the inclusion of this factor at [[paragraph]] 7(d)(123) of the proposed policy letter. We agree and have deleted this factor. The consideration listed may be relevant to what good contract management should require by way of contract conditions, but they don't say anything about the nature of the function or the adequacy of agency contract administration practices.

(g) Record keeping requirements. One commenter found the meaning of paragraph 8(d)(15) of the proposed policy letter unclear. This factor was included to cover situations such as a contractor's providing a aircraft-related training. If the contractor proves to be incompetent or negligent, the fact that the contractor did maintain or was required to maintain records of who was trained permits corrective action to be taken, such as locating improperly trained students and requiring retraining. If records are not maintained, the Government cannot exercise ultimate control because it cannot correct any errors. Nonetheless, the provision appears to have only limited application and has been deleted.

22. Collection of fees. Two commenters questioned the provision of [[paragraph]] 20 of Appendix A of the proposed policy letter prohibiting collection of fees or other public moneys, pointing out that contractors in mess halls for military personnel currently collect charges for meals and Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) contractors collect fees from purchasers of HUD properties. We have modified the policy letter to enable routine collection of fees where good cash management practices and other controls are in effect, where there is little danger of miscalculating the amount of money ultimately due the Government, and where there is little difficulty in obtaining payment. For example, a contractor could have discretion to determine that a family seeking entrance to a part consists of four people rather than three, and that one of the four is a child under 12, but the contractor would not have the discretion to determine the amount of the fee to be paid by each person in a particular category. HUD contractors may also collect fees from purchasers of HUD properties in accordance with subsection 17(a) of Appendix A. We also make clear that routine voucher and invoice examination by contractors is an acceptable practice.
23. Contract for one function or several. One commenter questioned whether the policy letter reflects our belief that only contracts with multiple functions are susceptible to confusion with respect to inherently governmental functions. This is not our belief. The policy letter is intended to provide guidance with respect to discrete functions regardless of whether there is a mixture of several functions in a contract or there is only one function that is being contracted.
24. Post-aware responsibilities. Section 7(e) has been amended to make clear that agency contract oversight is to ensure contractor performance in accordance with the terms of the contract, but that oversight must not be exercised so as to create a personal service contract. Language from subsection 7(d) of the proposed policy letter has been moved to subsection 7(e), as explained in [[section]] 21, above.
25. Drafting of Congressional testimony, responses to Congressional correspondence, and agency responses to audit reports from an Inspector General, the General Accounting Office or other Federal audit entity. Two commenters questioned whether contractors should be able to draft Congressional testimony, subject to ultimate agency approval. Approval is a key power reserved to any official and we by no means agree that officials do or will approve contractor work in a perfunctory manner. We have nonetheless reexamined this issue and, because of the importance of Congressional testimony and correspondence of agency responses to audit reports, we are not deciding, as a matter of policy, that these documents should not be drafted by contractors. We have thus added a new subsection (c) to the body of the policy letter to this effect. We deleted the relative portions of Appendix A because we do not believe that drafting documents per se is an inherently governmental function and failing to exercise sufficient oversight with respect to drafting of such documents does not transform the underlying function into an inherently governmental function, as noted in subsection [[paragraph]] 21(a), above. Contractor reports, conclusions, summaries, analyses, and other work products may, of course, still be quoted correspondence, and responses to audit reports, or set out in such things as attachments, appendices, or enclosures thereto.
26. Reliance on contractor support. One commenter called attention to our statement in [[paragraph]] 4 of the policy letter that agencies "award service contracts for various reasons, such as to acquire special skills not available in the Government or to meet the need for intermittent services." The commenter pointed out that "'support service' contractors have come to serve as the permanent workforce for many programs" seemingly implying that our statement does not take this into account. In fact, our statement is an accurate one, citing only two of the reasons why agencies award service contracts as examples. Contracting actions under Circular A-76 are also a reason why agencies award service contracts.

Whatever the reason for using service contracts to accomplish agency missions, it is important to understand that agency use of the function must not be an inherently government function, and if it is not, the agency must be able to exercise effective oversight of any contract awarded. We make clear that management of a contract is just as important as deciding whether the contract may properly be awarded in the first place.

Our policy letter is limited in scope and does not focus on why agencies use service contracts. Rather we are concerned that service contracts, when used, are used only when contractors may perform the functions in question and when agencies have the resources to manage the contracts. It is true that agencies have sometimes contracted functions that we have listed in the policy letter as inherently governmental functions, and it is true that they have sometimes failed to recognize that they were not exercising effective oversight over nongovernmental functions that had been contracted. Nonetheless, effective corrective action has been taken by the agencies in the past when oversight problems were identified.

Additional problems in this area will probably arise in the future. Even the General Accounting Office recognized the difficulty in defining inherently government functions and providing guidance to agencies on the subject. Are Service Contractors Performing Inherently Governmental Functions?, GAO/GGD-92-11, November 1991, p. 3. We have every reason to expect, however, that because our guidance is much more detailed than anything that was available to agencies in the past there will be fewer instances of problems in this area. We thus disagree strongly with the commenter that the policy letter is a mere exhortation to better management.

27. Other issues. One commenter also suggested that we should address whether "contractors who perform work historically performed by civil servants should be subjected to comparable limitations on pay and rules of conduct;" measurement of the short-term and long-term costs of reliance on contractors versus officials; whether Superfund and the savings and loan bailout programs "provide models for public management of the next bailout or cleanup program;" and the "practical meaning that we will give to the concept of 'public service' as the Federal Government heads into the 21st century."

The concept of work "historically performed" by civil servants is not useful because a function may have been performed by civil servants in the past for reasons other than the belief that the function was inherently governmental. In fact, the premise of Circular No. A-76 is that many functions historically performed by Government employees can more appropriately be performed by the private sector.

We believe that competition is the most powerful force available to keep costs down, even though there may be instances where this will not be so. In such instances, determinations shall be made in accordance with Circular No. A-76.

Measurement of the short-term and long-term costs of reliance on contractors versus officials is an aspect of cost effectiveness of service contracts and need not be dealt with here. Similarly, the efficacy of the Superfund and savings and loan programs is a matter beyond the scope of this policy letter.

So far as the practical meaning of the concept of public service is concerned, this policy letter attempts to identify those functions that, as a matter of policy, should only be performed by Government officials and those that may be performed by service contractors. If our taxonomy and analytical methods are sound, our policy letter should define what public service entails in terms of the functions that officials must perform for the foreseeable future.

28. Acknowledgment. Finally, we wish to acknowledge our reliance on the excellent work of the Environmental Protection Agency in our drafting of the appendices to this policy letter. Also, the comments we received were all exceptionally well thought out. We are most grateful for the time, effort and imagination that went into the preparation of those comments.

20e. Why is it necessary to close and/or partially close committee meetings?

Meetings do not have to be closed.

21. Remarks

As a newly established commission, EAC had to convene a meeting for both boards in a short period of time. The meetings were held together, therefore, the cost figures for Federal Staff, Travel:Federal Staff, and Federal Staff Support are the same as those given for the Standards Board. Two full-time staff members supported the activities of both boards during FY2004, and it is estimated that they spent about 10% of their time providing administrative support for the boards and their coordinating activities. Travel:Federal Staff amount includes airfare and per diem. The $57,243.77 amount given for other costs reflects expenses incurred for sleeping rooms ($20,793.00), food ($18,302.76), equipment ($7326.55), court recorder ($2,485.95), photographer ($1,470.00), Sign language interpreter ($1,400.00), photocopying ($465.52 - Houston), and Supplies/Courier/FedEX ($5,000.00).

20a. How does the Committee accomplish its purpose?

TGDC meets in lenary session to discuss, debate and pass resolutions that instruct the National Institute of Standards and Technology on the policy considerations for developing voluntary voting system guidelines. In addition, three subcommittees (Security and Transparency, Human Factors and Privacy, and Core Requirements and Testing) meet to discuss issues related to their subject matter and involving the development of testable guidelines for voting systems.

20b. How does the Committee balance its membership?

The membership of TGDC is established by Section 221 of the Help American Vote Act of 2002. All members and representatives were chosen in keeping with the provisions of that statute.

20c. How frequent and relevant are the Committee meetings?

TGDC has met in 3 plenary sessions over the past year. In addition, the subcommittees have met over 20 times during the past year. These meetings are crucial to the development of comprehensive guidelines regarding the technical functioning of voting systems. It is anticipated that TGDC will continue to meet with the same frequency over the next year.

20d. Why can't the advice or information this committee provides be obtained elsewhere?

EAC is required by law (Section 221 of HAVA) to obtain advice from the TGDC. To use some other body or group to provide such advice would violate Federal law.

20e. Why is it necessary to close and/or partially close committee meetings?

All TGDC meetings have been open to the public.

CHARTER OF THE U.S. ELECTION ASSISTANCE COMMISSION STANDARDS BOARD
The U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC) hereby Charters the Standards Board established in title II section 211 of the Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA) [Public Law 107-252] pursuant to the Federal Advisory Committee Act. OBJECTIVES AND DUTIES 1. The objective of the Standards Board (the Board) is to advise the EAC through review of the voluntary voting systems guidelines described in title II Part 3 of the HAVA; through review of the voluntary guidance described under title III of HAVA; and through the review of the best practices recommendations contained in the report submitted under Section 242(b) of title II (HAVA title II section 212). 2. The Board will function solely as an advisory body and will comply fully with the provisions of the Federal Advisory Committee Act. MEMBERSHIP 1. The Board shall consist of 110 members. 55 members shall be State election officials selected by the chief State election official of each State. 55 shall be local election officials selected under a process supervised by the chief election official of the State. The 2 members of the Standards Board who represent the same State may not be members of the same political party. (HAVA title II section 213 (a)). Vacancy appointments shall be made in the same manner as the original appointments. 2. The Board shall select 9 of its members as an Executive Board of whom, not more than 5 may be State election officials; not more than 5 may be local election officials; and not more than 5 may be members of the same political party. Members of the Executive Board shall serve 2 year terms and may not serve more than 3 consecutive terms. Of the initial Executive Board, 3 members shall serve for 1 term; 3 shall serve for 2 consecutive terms; and 3 shall serve for 3 consecutive terms, as determined by lot at the time the members are first appointed (HAVA title II, section 213 (c)). ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS 1. The Board will report to the EAC through the Advisory Committee Management Officer pursuant to 5 U.S.C. App.1 section 8 (b). This officer shall be an EAC Commissioner designated by the Chairman of the EAC. 2. purposes of selecting the Executive Board. Additional meetings may be called at such other times as it considers appropriate for the purposes of conducting other business as it considers appropriate consistent with title II of HAVA. (HAVA title II, section 215 (a)(2)). 3. The EAC and GAO will provide clerical and other necessary support services to the Board. (HAVA title II, section 215 (d)). 4. Members of the Board will not be compensated for their services but will be reimbursed for travel expenses and subsistence. (HAVA title II section 215 (e)). 5. The Board may use the United States mails in the same manner and under the same conditions as a department or agency of the Federal Government. (HAVA title II, section 215 (c)). 6. The annual cost for operating the Board is estimated at $210,000 which includes one quarter staff year for support services. 7. The Board may establish such committees of its members as may be necessary subject to the provisions of the law. 8. The Board may, by simple majority vote, adopt resolutions and make recommendations. Such resolutions and recommendations will, however, be only advisory to the EAC and will be restricted to the EAC's activities described in title II section 212 of the Help America Vote Act of 2002. 9. The EAC will provide liaison services between the Board and the Advisory Panel Secretariat as required by the Federal Advisory Committee Act. DURATION This is a permanent committee as established in title II section 215 (f) of the Help America Vote Act of 2002.

20e. Why is it necessary to close and/or partially close committee meetings?

Meetings are not closed.

21. Remarks

As a newly established commission, EAC had to convene a meeting for both boards in a short period of time. The meetings were held together, therefore, the cost figures for Federal Staff, Travel:Federal Staff, and Federal Staff Support are the same as those given for the Board of Advisors. Two full-time staff members supported the activities of both boards during FY2004, and it is estimated that they spent about 10% of their time providing administrative support for the boards and their coordinating activities. Travel:Federal Staff amount includes airfare and per diem. The $57,243.77 amount given for other costs reflects expenses incurred for sleeping rooms ($20,793.00), food ($18,302.76), equipment ($7326.55), court recorder ($2,485.95), photographer ($1,470.00), Sign language interpreter ($1,400.00), photocopying ($465.52 - Houston), and Supplies/Courier/FedEX ($5,000.00).

voluntary voting system guidelines. In addition, three subcommittees (Security and Transparency, Human Factors and Privacy, and Core Requirements and Testing) meet to discuss issues related to their subject matter and involving the development of testable guidelines for voting systems.

20b. How does the Committee balance its membership?

The membership of TGDC is established by Section 221 of the Help American Vote Act of 2002. All members and representatives were chosen in keeping with the provisions of that statute.

20c. How frequent and relevant are the Committee meetings?

TGDC has met in 4 plenary sessions over the past year. In addition, the subcommittees have met via teleconferences 61 times during the past year. These meetings are crucial to the development of comprehensive guidelines regarding the technical functioning of voting systems. It is anticipated that TGDC will continue to meet with the same frequency over the next year.

20d. Why can't the advice or information this committee provides be obtained elsewhere?

EAC is required by law (Section 221 of HAVA) to obtain advice from the TGDC. To use some other body or group to provide such advice would violate Federal law.

20e. Why is it necessary to close and/or partially close committee meetings?

All TGDC meetings have been open to the public. A webcast of each FY 2005 meeting may be found on the website <http://www.vote.nist.gov/>.

Meetings do not have to be closed.

21. Remarks

As a newly established commission, EAC had to convene a meeting for both boards in a short period of time. The meetings were held together, therefore, the cost figures for Federal Staff, Travel:Federal Staff, and Federal Staff Support are the same as those given for the Standards Board. One full-time staff member supported the activities of the board during FY2006, and it is estimated that this person spent about 10% of their time providing administrative support for the boards and their coordinating activities. Board of Advisors members serve two year terms. Several members were replaced by new members.

20a. How does the Committee accomplish its purpose?

TGDC meets in plenary sessions to discuss, debate and pass resolutions that instruct the National Institute of Standards and Technology on the policy considerations for developing voluntary voting system guidelines. In addition, three subcommittees (Security and Transparency, Human Factors and Privacy, and Core Requirements and Testing) meet to discuss issues related to their subject matter and involving the development of testable guidelines for voting systems.

20b. How does the Committee balance its membership?

The membership of TGDC is established by Section 221 of the Help American Vote Act of 2002. All members and representatives were chosen in keeping with the provisions of that statute.

20c. How frequent and relevant are the Committee meetings?

TGDC has met in 4 plenary sessions over the past year. In addition, the subcommittees have met via teleconferences 61 times during the past year. These meetings are crucial to the development of comprehensive guidelines regarding the technical functioning of voting systems. It is anticipated that TGDC will continue to meet with the same frequency over the next year.

20d. Why can't the advice or information this committee provides be obtained elsewhere?

EAC is required by law (Section 221 of HAVA) to obtain advice from the TGDC. To use some other body or group to provide such advice would violate Federal law.

20e. Why is it necessary to close and/or partially close committee meetings?

All TGDC meetings have been open to the public. A webcast of each FY 2006 meeting may be found on the website <http://www.vote.nist.gov/>.

Subject: U.S. Election Assistance Commission Activities Pending the Office of Inspector General Investigation of the Voting Fraud and Voter Intimidation Report

In your letter of April 23, 2007, you requested my comments concerning several activities that the Election Assistance Commission (EAC) was considering to undertake pending our review of the Voting Fraud and Voter Intimidation Study and on related questions. My responses to your proposed activities and questions follow:

1. The EAC would like to prepare a summary of the differences between the draft report prepared by the consultants and the final report adopted by the EAC.

Answer: We believe that such a summary will be helpful to our investigation. Please provide us with a copy of the summary of differences upon it is completion.

2. Would there be any prohibition against the Director of Communications speaking with EAC employees, consultants or working group members when questions arise from members of the press or under the Freedom of Information Act?

Answer: We are not aware of any prohibition. However, we suggest that EAC not comment or limit its comments on this matter because of the ongoing investigation. Any FOIA requests should be promptly responded to stating that the matter is under investigation. Once the investigation is completed, appropriate information should be made available to the FOIA requester.

3. Would there be any prohibition against EAC briefing members of the EAC Standards Board and the EAC Board of Advisors.

Answer: We are not aware of any prohibition. Our preference, however, would be that EAC allow the investigation to be completed before conducting any briefings.

4. Would there be any prohibition against gathering information related to this project in order to respond to inquiries that have been made by members of Congress?

Answer: We are not aware of any prohibition. As previously stated, our preference is that there are no public comments while the investigation is in process or that comments be limited. However, we appreciate the sensitivity of Congressional requests, EAC must decide how best to proceed in this matter. We ask that you share any proposed responses with us prior to their release and that you provide us with a copy of final responses and any attachments.

5. Would there be any prohibition against responding to an inquiry that the Commission has received from an attorney engaged by one of the consultants?

Answer: It is the EAC's decision whether to respond to the attorney for the consultant. We prefer that the consultants not be released from the confidentiality clause of their contracts until the OIG has completed its investigations.

We understand that EAC will want to respond to criticism of its handling of the Voter Fraud and Intimidation Study, and that management must ultimately decide how best to proceed. Our preference would be that you attempt to defer commenting until we have finished our investigation.

I appreciate you raising these matters to me before acting. Please feel free to contact me if you have any questions about this memorandum.

Dear Commissioners,

As a member of the Election Assistance Commission (EAC) Board of Advisors and a member of the EAC's Working Group on Voter Fraud and Voter Intimidation, I write requesting the release of the EAC's Voter Fraud and Voter Intimidation Report. This report was commissioned over a year ago and has yet to be released. In May, 2006 the Working Group met to discuss the project and was told that the final report would be released shortly thereafter. Five months later, and on the heels of another national election, election officials, policy makers and advocates are without guidance from the EAC on this critical subject. Across the country and at all levels of government, legislative and judicial debates that should be informed by the report's findings continue. The EAC has had ample time to research and release this critical report. There is no reasonable explanation for this delay.

Please immediately release the Election Assistance Commission's Voter Fraud and Voter Intimidation report. If immediate release is not possible, please provide me with an explanation of the delay and a detailed time line for the report's release.

Thank You.

Dear Commissioners,

On October 11th, USA Today published an article describing the report commissioned by the EAC on voter fraud. We write today to urge the EAC to release this report.

As a 25 year old civil rights and civil liberties organization, People For the American Way Foundation (PFAWF) and our sister organization, People For the American Way (PFAW) have long been dedicated to ensuring the integrity of our elections. In particular in the years since the 2000 election, PFAWF and other principle partners such as the NAACP and the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law, have carried out a program called Election Protection to ensure that all eligible voters are able to vote and have that vote counted as cast.

We know that voter fraud and intimidation occur- we've seen the long lines, the erroneous purges, the misleading flyers and phone calls. And yet there seems to be little attention to these matters on the state and federal level.

Instead, a disproportionate amount of time and energy are spent on measures that purport to curb voter fraud by requiring voters to produce proof of citizenship and identity to vote. In actuality, these measures do little to secure the elections and much to disenfranchise otherwise eligible voters. Indeed we are weeks away from an election where thousands of eligible voters may be disenfranchised by overly restrictive voter identification laws. That presents a real threat to the integrity of our elections and the health of our democracy.

The report that the EAC commissioned from voting experts would make a vitally important contribution to the national discourse on the reality of voter fraud. In light of the numerous claims regarding the prevalence of voter fraud, this report provides a much needed analysis about the state of our electoral process. While media reports indicate that this tax-payer funded report is final, even if there are outstanding concerns within the EAC, we implore you to move forward with releasing the report as is, and to hold a public hearing to address any potential issues. Again, the importance of the information in this report is paramount and the public deserves such full disclosure. The report should be released immediately so that those who are concerned about ensuring the integrity of elections can benefit from its findings.

Sincerely,

Ralph G. Neas

RE: October 16, 2006 Letter

Dear Congressman Holt:

Your letter of October 16, 2006 requests the release of EAC's Voter Fraud and Intimidation Report. I would like to take this opportunity to clarify the purpose and status of this study.

In late 2005, EAC hired two consultants for the purpose of assisting EAC with two things: 1) developing a uniform definition of the phrase voter fraud, and 2) making recommendations on how to further study the existence, prosecution, and means of deterring such voter fraud. In May 2006, a status report on this study was given to the EAC Standards Board and EAC Board of Advisors during their public meetings. During the same week, a working group convened to react to and provide comment on the progress and potential conclusions that could be reached from the work of the two consultants.

The conversation at the working group meeting was lively on the very points that we were trying to accomplish as a part of this study, namely what is voter fraud and how do we pursue studying it. Many of the proposed conclusions that were suggested by the consultants were challenged by the working group members. As such, the consultants were tasked with reviewing the concerns expressed at the working group meeting, conducting additional research as necessary, and providing a draft report to EAC that took into account the working group's concerns and issues.

That draft report is currently being vetted by EAC staff. EAC will release a final report from this study after it has conducted a review of the draft provided by the consultants. However, it is important to remember the purpose of this study -- finding a uniform definition of voter fraud and making recommendations on how to study the existence, prosecution and deterrence of voter fraud -- as it will serve as the basis of the EAC report on this study.

Thank you for your letter. You can be assured that as soon as a final report on the fraud and intimidation study is available, a copy will be made available to the public.

Sincerely,

Dear Chairman DeGregorio:

On behalf of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, I write to inquire about the status of a report on voter fraud allegedly produced by the Election Assistance Commission. The U.S. Commission on Civil Rights held a briefing on October 13, 2006 on voter fraud and voter intimidation. During this briefing, a panelist cited media reports that the Election Assistance Commission had produced a report on voter fraud but had not yet released it to the public. It would be useful to know the status of this report as Election Day approaches. Any information provided by the Election Assistance Commission would be of great value to all voters seeking to effectively exercise their right to vote.

INTRODUCTION

Section 241 of the Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA) requires EAC to conduct research on election administration issues. Among the tasks listed in the statute is the development of:

- nationwide statistics and methods of identifying, deterring, and investigating voting fraud in elections for Federal office [section 241(b)(6)]; and
- ways of identifying, deterring, and investigating methods of voter intimidation [section 241(b)(7)].

EAC's Board of Advisors recommended that the agency make research on these matters a high priority.

FOCUS OF CURRENT RESEARCH

In September 2005, the Commission hired two consultants with expertise in this subject matter, Job Serebrov and Tova Wang, to:

- develop a comprehensive description of what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation in the context of Federal elections;
- perform background research (including Federal and State administrative and case law review), identify current activities of key government agencies, civic and advocacy organizations regarding these topics, and deliver a summary of this research and all source documentation;
- establish a project working group, in consultation with EAC, composed of key individuals and representatives of organizations knowledgeable about the topics of voting fraud and voter intimidation;
- provide the description of what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation and the results of the preliminary research to the working group, and convene the working group to discuss potential avenues for future EAC research on this topic; and
- produce a report to EAC summarizing the findings of the preliminary research effort and working group deliberations that includes recommendations for future research, if any;

As of the date of this report, the consultants have drafted a definition of election fraud, reviewed relevant literature and reports, interviewed persons from government and private sectors with subject matter expertise, analyzed news reports of alleged election fraud, reviewed case law, and established a project working group.

DEFINITION OF ELECTION FRAUD

The consultants drafted a definition of election fraud that includes numerous aspects of voting fraud (including voter intimidation, which is considered a subset of voting fraud) and voter registration fraud, but excludes campaign finance violations and election administration mistakes. This draft will be discussed and probably refined by the project working group, which is scheduled to convene on May 18, 2006.

LITERATURE REVIEW

The consultants found many reports and books that describe anecdotes and draw broad conclusions from a large array of incidents. They found little research that is truly systematic or scientific. The most systematic look at fraud appears to be the report written by Lori Minnite, entitled "Securing the Vote: An Analysis of Election Fraud". The most systematic look at voter intimidation appears to be the report by Laughlin McDonald, entitled "The New Poll Tax". The consultants found that books written about this subject all seem to have a political bias and a pre-existing agenda that makes them somewhat less valuable.

Moreover, the consultants found that reports and books make allegations but, perhaps by their nature, have little follow up. As a result, it is difficult to know when something has remained in the stage of being an allegation and gone no further, or progressed to the point of being investigated or prosecuted or in any other way proven to be valid by an independent, neutral entity. This is true, for example, with respect to allegations of voter intimidation by civil rights organizations, and, with respect to fraud, John Fund's frequently cited book, "Stealing Elections".

Consultants found that researchers agree that measuring something like the incidence of fraud and intimidation in a scientifically legitimate way is extremely difficult from a methodological perspective and would require resources beyond the means of most social and political scientists. As a result, there is much more written on this topic by advocacy groups than social scientists.

Other items of note:

- There is as much evidence, and as much concern, about structural forms of disenfranchisement as about intentional abuse of the system. These include felon disenfranchisement, poor maintenance of databases and identification requirements.
- There is tremendous disagreement about the extent to which polling place fraud, e.g. double voting, intentional felon voting, noncitizen voting, is a serious problem. On balance, more researchers find it to be less of a problem than is commonly described in the political debate; but some reports say it is a major problem, albeit hard to identify.

- There is substantial concern across the board about absentee balloting and the opportunity it presents for fraud.
- Federal law governing election fraud and intimidation is varied and complex and yet may nonetheless be insufficient or subject to too many limitations to be as effective as it might be.
- Deceptive practices, e.g. targeted flyers and phone calls providing misinformation, were a major problem in 2004.
- Voter intimidation continues to be focused on minority communities, although the American Center for Voting Rights uniquely alleges it is focused on Republicans.

Recommendations

The consultants recommend that subsequent EAC research include a follow up study of allegations made in reports, books and newspaper articles. They also suggest that the research should focus on filling the gap between the lack of reports based on methodical studies by social or political scientists and the numerous, but less scientific, reports published by advocacy groups.

INTERVIEWS

The consultants jointly selected experts from the public and private sector for interviews. The consultants' analysis of their discussions with these members of the legal, election official, advocacy, and academic communities follows.

Common Themes

- There is virtually universal agreement that absentee ballot fraud is the biggest problem, with vote buying and registration fraud coming in after that. The vote buying often comes in the form of payment for absentee ballots, although not always. Some absentee ballot fraud is part of an organized effort; some is by individuals, who sometimes are not even aware that what they are doing is illegal. Voter registration fraud seems to take the form of people signing up with false names. Registration fraud seems to be most common where people doing the registration were paid by the signature.
- There is widespread but not unanimous agreement that there is little polling place fraud, or at least much less than is claimed, including voter impersonation, "dead" voters, noncitizen voting and felon voters. Those few who believe it occurs often enough to be a concern say that it is impossible to show the extent to which it happens, but do point to instances in the press of such incidents. Most people believe that false registration forms have not resulted in polling place fraud, although it may create the perception that vote fraud is possible. Those who believe there is more polling place fraud than reported/investigated/prosecuted believe that registration fraud does lead to fraudulent votes. Jason Torchinsky from the American Center for Voting Rights is the only interviewee who believes that polling place fraud is widespread and among the most significant problems in the system.

- Abuse of challenger laws and abusive challengers seem to be the biggest intimidation/suppression concerns, and many of those interviewed assert that the new identification requirements are the modern version of voter intimidation and suppression. However there is evidence of some continued outright intimidation and suppression, especially in some Native American communities. A number of people also raise the problem of poll workers engaging in harassment of minority voters. Other activities commonly raised were the issue of polling places being moved at the last moment, unequal distribution of voting machines, videotaping of voters at the polls, and targeted misinformation campaigns.
- Several people indicate that, for various reasons, DOJ is bringing fewer voter intimidation and suppression cases now, and has increased its focus on matters such as noncitizen voting, double voting, and felon voting. Interviews with DOJ personnel indicate that the Voting Section, Civil Rights Division, focuses on systemic patterns of malfeasance in this area. While the Election Crimes Branch, Public Integrity Section, continues to maintain an aggressive pursuit of systematic schemes to corrupt the electoral process (including voter suppression), it also has increased prosecutions of individual instances of felon, alien, and double voting.
- The problem of badly kept voter registration lists, with both ineligible voters remaining on the rolls and eligible voters being taken off, remains a common concern. A few people are also troubled by voters being on registration lists in two states. They said that there was no evidence that this had led to double voting, but it opens the door to the possibility. There is great hope that full implementation of the new requirements of HAVA – done well, a major caveat – will reduce this problem dramatically.

Common Recommendations:

- Many of those interviewed recommend better poll worker training as the best way to improve the process; a few also recommended longer voting times or voting on days other than election day (such as weekends) but fewer polling places so only the best poll workers would be employed.
- Many interviewed support stronger criminal laws and increased enforcement of existing laws with respect to both fraud and intimidation. Advocates from across the spectrum expressed frustration with the failure of the Department of Justice to pursue complaints.

- With respect to DOJ's Voting Section, Civil Rights Division, John Tanner indicated that fewer cases are being brought because fewer are warranted – it has become increasingly difficult to know when allegations of intimidation and suppression are credible since it depends on one's definition of intimidation, and because both parties are doing it. Moreover prior enforcement of the laws has now changed the entire landscape – race based problems are rare now. Although challenges based on race and unequal implementation of identification rules would be actionable, Mr. Tanner was unaware of such situations actually occurring and his office has not pursued any such cases.
- Craig Donsanto of DOJ's Election Crimes Branch, Public Integrity Section, says that while the number of election fraud related complaints have not gone up since 2002, nor has the proportion of legitimate to illegitimate claims of fraud, the number of cases DOJ is investigating and the number of indictments his office is pursuing are both up dramatically. Since 2002, in addition to pursuing systematic election corruption schemes, DOJ has brought more cases against alien voters, felon voters and double voters than ever before. Mr. Donsanto would like more resources so that his agency can do more and would like to have laws that make it easier for the federal government to assume jurisdiction over voter fraud cases.
- A couple of interviewees recommend a new law that would make it easier to criminally prosecute people for intimidation even when there is not racial animus.
- Several advocate expanded monitoring of the polls, including some associated with the Department of Justice.
- Almost everyone hopes that administrators will maximize the potential of statewide voter registration databases to prevent fraud.
- Challenge laws, both with respect to pre-election day challenges and challengers at the polls, need to be revised by all states to ensure they are not used for purposes of wrongful disenfranchisement and harassment.
- Several people advocate passage of Senator Barak Obama's "deceptive practices" bill.
- There is a split on whether it would be helpful to have nonpartisan election officials – some indicated they thought even if elections officials are elected as non partisan officials, they will carry out their duties in biased ways nonetheless. However, most agree that elections officials pursuing partisan agendas are a problem that must be addressed in some fashion. Suggestions included moving election responsibilities out of the secretary of states' office; increasing transparency in the process; and enacting conflict of interest rules.

- A few recommend returning to allowing use of absentee ballots “for cause” only if it were politically feasible.
- A few recommend enacting a national identification card, including Pat Rogers, an attorney in New Mexico, and Jason Torchinsky from ACVR, who advocates the proposal in the Carter-Baker Commission Report.
- A couple of interviewees indicated the need for clear standards for the distribution of voting machines

NEWS ARTICLES

Consultants conducted a Nexis search of related news articles published between January 1, 2001 and January 1, 2006. A systematic, numerical analysis of the data collected during this review is currently being prepared. What follows is an overview of these articles provided by the consultants.

Absentee Ballots

According to press reports, absentee ballots are abused in a variety of ways:

- Campaign workers, candidates and others coerce the voting choices of vulnerable populations, usually elderly voters.
- Workers for groups and individuals have attempted to vote absentee in the names of the deceased.
- Workers for groups, campaign workers and individuals have attempted to forge the names of other voters on absentee ballot requests and absentee ballots and thus vote multiple times.

It is unclear how often actual convictions result from these activities (a handful of articles indicate convictions and guilty pleas), but this is an area in which there have been a substantial number of official investigations and actual charges filed, according to news reports where such information is available. A few of the allegations became part of civil court proceedings contesting the outcome of the election.

While absentee fraud allegations turn up throughout the country, a few states have had several such cases. Especially of note are Indiana, New Jersey, South Dakota, and most particularly, Texas. Interestingly, there were no articles regarding Oregon, where the entire system is vote by mail.

Voter Registration Fraud

According to press reports, the following types of allegations of voter registration fraud are most common:

- Registering in the name of dead people;
- Fake names and other information on voter registration forms;
- Illegitimate addresses used on voter registration forms;
- Voters being tricked into registering for a particular party under false pretenses; and
- Destruction of voter registration forms depending on the party the voter registered with.

There was only one self evident instance of a noncitizen registering to vote. Many of the instances reported included official investigations and charges filed, but few actual convictions, at least from the news reporting. There have been multiple reports of registration fraud in California, Colorado, Florida, Missouri, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, South Dakota, and Wisconsin.

Voter Intimidation and Suppression

This is the area which had the most articles, in part because there were so many allegations of intimidation and suppression during the 2004 election. Most of these remained allegations and no criminal investigation or prosecution ensued. Some of the cases did end up in civil litigation.

This is not to say that these alleged activities were confined to 2004 – there were several allegations made during every year studied. Most notable were the high number of allegations of voter intimidation and harassment reported during the 2003 Philadelphia mayoral race.

A very high number of the articles were about the issue of challenges to voters' registration status and challengers at the polling places. There were many allegations that planned challenge activities were targeted at minority communities. Some of the challenges were concentrated in immigrant communities.

However, the tactics alleged varied greatly. The types of activities discussed also include the following:

- Photographing or videotaping voters coming out of polling places;
- Improper demands for identification;

006196

- Poll watchers harassing voters;
- Poll workers being hostile to or aggressively challenging voters;
- Disproportionate police presence;
- Poll watchers wearing clothes with messages that seemed intended to intimidate; and
- Insufficient voting machines and unmanageably long lines.

Although the incidents reported on occurred everywhere, not surprisingly, many came from “battleground” states. There were several such reports out of Florida, Ohio, and Pennsylvania.

“Dead Voters and Multiple Voting”

There were a high number of articles about people voting in the names of the dead and voting more than once. Many of these articles were marked by allegations of big numbers of people committing these frauds, and relatively few of these allegations turning out to be accurate according to investigations by the newspapers themselves, elections officials, and criminal investigators. Often the problem turned out to be a result of administrative error, poll workers mis-marking voter lists, a flawed registration list and/or errors made in the attempt to match names of voters on the list with the names of the people who voted. In a good number of cases, there were allegations that charges of double voting by political leaders were an effort to scare people away from the voting process.

Nonetheless there were a few cases of people actually being charged and/or convicted for these kinds of activities. Most of the cases involved a person voting both by absentee ballot and in person. A few instances involved people voting both during early voting and on Election Day, which calls into question the proper marking and maintenance of the voting lists. In many instances, the person charged claimed not to have voted twice on purpose. A very small handful of cases involved a voter voting in more than one county and there was one substantiated case involving a person voting in more than one state. Other instances in which such efforts were alleged were disproved by officials.

In the case of voting in the name of a dead person, the problem lay in the voter registration list not being properly maintained, i.e. the person was still on the registration list as eligible to vote, and a person took criminal advantage of that. In total, the San Francisco Chronicle found five such cases in March 2004; the AP cited a newspaper analysis of five such persons in an Indiana primary in May 2004; and a senate committee found two people to have voted in the names of the dead in 2005.

As usual, there were a disproportionate number of such articles coming out of Florida. Notably, there were three articles out of Oregon, which has one hundred percent vote-by-mail.

Vote Buying

There were a surprising number of articles about vote buying cases. A few of these instances involved long-time investigations concentrated in three states (Illinois, Kentucky, and West Virginia). There were more official investigations, indictments and convictions/pleas in this area.

Deceptive Practices

In 2004 there were numerous reports of intentional disinformation about voting eligibility and the voting process meant to confuse voters about their rights and when and where to vote. Misinformation came in the form of flyers, phone calls, letters, and even people going door to door. Many of the efforts were reportedly targeted at minority communities. A disproportionate number of them came from key battleground states, particularly Florida, Ohio, and Pennsylvania. From the news reports found, only one of these instances was officially investigated, the case in Oregon involving the destruction of completed voter registration applications. There were no reports of prosecutions or any other legal proceeding.

Non-citizen Voting

There were surprisingly few articles regarding noncitizen registration and voting – just seven all together, in seven different states across the country. They were also evenly split between allegations of noncitizens registering and noncitizens voting. In one case, charges were filed against ten individuals. In another case, a judge in a civil suit found there was illegal noncitizen voting. Three instances prompted official investigations. Two cases, from this Nexis search, remained just allegations of noncitizen voting.

Felon Voting

Although there were only thirteen cases of felon voting, some of them involved large numbers of voters. Most notably, of course, are the cases that came to light in the Washington gubernatorial election contest (see Washington summary) and in Wisconsin (see Wisconsin summary). In several states, the main problem was the large number of ineligible felons that remained on the voting list.

Election Official Fraud

In most of the cases in which fraud by elections officials is suspected or alleged, it is difficult to determine whether it is incompetence or a crime. There are several cases of ballots gone missing, ballots unaccounted for and ballots ending up in a worker's possession. In two cases workers were said to have changed peoples' votes. The one instance in which widespread ballot box stuffing by elections workers was alleged was in Washington State. The judge in the civil trial of that election contest did not find that elections workers had committed fraud. Four of the cases are from Texas.

Recommendation

The consultants recommend that subsequent EAC research should include a Nexis search that specifically attempts to follow up on the cases for which no resolution is evident from this particular initial search.

CASE LAW RESEARCH

After reviewing over 40,000 cases from 2000 to the present, the majority of which came from appeals courts, the consultants found comparatively few applicable to this study. Of those that were applicable, the consultants found that no apparent thematic pattern emerges. However, it appears to them that the greatest areas of fraud and intimidation have shifted from past patterns of stealing votes to present problems with voter registration, voter identification, the proper delivery and counting of absentee and overseas ballots, provisional voting, vote buying, and challenges to felon eligibility.

Recommendation

Because so few cases provided a picture of these current problems, consultants suggest that subsequent EAC research include a review of state trial-level decisions.

PROJECT WORKING GROUP

Consultants and EAC worked together to select members for the Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Working Group that included election officials and representatives of advocacy groups and the legal community who have an interest and expertise in the subject matter. (See Attachment A for a list of members.) The working group is scheduled to convene at EAC offices on May 18, 2006 to consider the results of the preliminary research and to offer ideas for future EAC activities concerning this subject.

FINAL REPORT

After convening the project working group, the consultants will draft a final report summarizing the results of their research and the working group deliberations. This report will include recommendations for future EAC research related to this subject matter. The draft report will be reviewed by EAC and, after obtaining any clarifications or corrections deemed necessary, will be made available to the EAC Standards Board and EAC Board of Advisors for review and comment. Following this, a final report will be prepared.

TALLY VOTE MEMORANDUM

TO: EAC Commissioners Hillman, DeGregorio, Martinez, Davidson
FROM: Thomas Wilkey, EAC Executive Director
DATE: September 16, 2005
RE: Consulting assistance with developing an Election Assistance Commission (EAC) Voting Fraud and Voter Intimidation Project

Background

“On such periodic basis as the Commission may determine, the Commission shall conduct and make available to the public studies regarding the election administration issues described in subsection (b)” Sections 241(b) (6) and (7) list the following election administration issues:

(6) Nationwide statistics and methods of identifying, deterring and investigating voting fraud in election for Federal offices.

(7) Identifying, deterring and investigating methods of voter intimidation.

Building on this HAVA reference to studies of voting fraud and voter intimidation, the EAC Board of Advisors has indicated that further study of these issues, to determine how the EAC might respond to them, is a high priority.

The U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC) has identified two senior-level project consultants to develop various project activities and studies related to voting fraud and voter intimidation affecting Federal elections. The consultants, whose contracts would run for the period September-February, 2005, would be responsible for helping the EAC identify what constitutes voting fraud and voter intimidation affecting Federal elections.

To accomplish this the consultants will: perform background research, including Federal and state-by state administrative and case law review related to voting fraud and voter intimidation, along with a review of current voting fraud and voter intimidation activities taking place with key government agencies, civic and advocacy organizations; in consultation with EAC, identify and convene, a working group of key individuals and representatives of organizations knowledgeable about the topics of voting fraud and voter intimidation; develop an EAC project scope of work and a project work plan related to voting fraud and voter intimidation and; author a report summarizing the key findings of this preliminary study of voting fraud and voter intimidation.

Recommendation

Attached is the Statement of Work for the voting fraud and voter intimidation project consultants. The consultant contract fees total $110,000 ($55,000 per person). An additional $10,000 is allotted for the voting fraud and intimidation project working group. The total project amount is $120,000.

Existing Research Analysis

There are many reports and books that describe anecdotes and draw broad conclusions from a large array of incidents. There is little research that is truly systematic or scientific. The most systematic look at fraud is the report written by Lori Minnite. The most systematic look at voter intimidation is the report by Laughlin McDonald. Books written about this subject seem to all have a political bias and a pre-existing agenda that makes them somewhat less valuable.

Researchers agree that measuring something like the incidence of fraud and intimidation in a scientifically legitimate way is extremely difficult from a methodological perspective and would require resources beyond the means of most social and political scientists. As a result, there is much more written on this topic by advocacy groups than social scientists. It is hoped that this gap will be filled in the "second phase" of this EAC project.

Moreover, reports and books make allegations but, perhaps by their nature, have little follow up. As a result, it is difficult to know when something has remained in the stage of being an allegation and gone no further, or progressed to the point of being investigated or prosecuted or in any other way proven to be valid by an independent, neutral entity. This is true, for example, with respect to allegations of voter intimidation by civil rights organizations, and, with respect to fraud, John Fund's frequently cited book. Again, this is something that it is hoped will be addressed in the "second phase" of this EAC project by doing follow up research on allegations made in reports, books and newspaper articles.

Other items of note:

- There is as much evidence, and as much concern, about structural forms of disenfranchisement as about intentional abuse of the system. These include felon disenfranchisement, poor maintenance of databases and identification requirements.
- There is tremendous disagreement about the extent to which polling place fraud, e.g. double voting, intentional felon voting, noncitizen voting, is a serious problem. On balance, more researchers find it to be less of a problem than is commonly described in the political debate, but some reports say it is a major problem, albeit hard to identify.
- There is substantial concern across the board about absentee balloting and the opportunity it presents for fraud.
- Federal law governing election fraud and intimidation is varied and complex and yet may nonetheless be insufficient or subject to too many limitations to be as effective as it might be.

006202

- Deceptive practices, e.g. targeted flyers and phone calls providing misinformation, were a major problem in 2004.
- Voter intimidation continues to be focused on minority communities, although the American Center for Voting Rights uniquely alleges it is focused on Republicans.

Introduction

Our report, submitted to the EAC last June, provided information on voter identification practices in the 2004 election. It made recommendations for best practices to evaluate future proposals for voter ID requirements. In particular, we recommended a concerted, systematic effort to collect and evaluate information on voter ID requirements and turnout from the states. This report was a companion to our report on Provisional Voting, submitted to the EAC in November 2005.

The research was conducted by the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers, the State University of New Jersey, and the Moritz College of Law at the Ohio State University under a contract with the EAC, dated May 24, 2005. Our work included a review and legal analysis of state statutes, regulations and litigation concerning voter identification and provisional voting as well as a statistical analysis of the relationship of various requirements for voter identification to turnout in the 2004 election.

Voter ID requirements are just one set of election rules that may affect turnout. Social scientists have long studied how election rules affect participation in elections. The general view today is that the individual citizen chooses whether to vote by comparing costs and benefits. The benefits of voting are fairly stable --and hard to specify given the remote probability that any one vote will make a difference in an election. But whatever the benefit may be, as the costs of voting (for example, time, hassle, acquisition of information) increase, the likelihood that a citizen will vote decreases.

We conducted our research before last year's election, when the debate over voter ID requirements was sharp and polarized. We took seriously our charge from the EAC, which was not to enter the national debate, but rather to explore if an empirical study could suggest how we might estimate the effects of different voter ID requirements on turnout. That analysis, of course, would be a sensible first step to assess tradeoffs between ballot security and ballot access and provide valuable information for all parties to the debate.

A voting system that requires voters to produce an identity document or documents may prevent the ineligible from voting. It may also prevent eligible voters from casting a ballot. If the ID requirement of a ballot protection system blocks ineligible voters from the polls at the cost of preventing eligible voters who lack the required forms of identification, the net integrity of the ballot may not have been improved.

A key part of our work was a statistical analysis to examine how turnout may vary under different voter identification requirements. We used this statistical study to develop a model to illuminate the relationships between voter ID requirements and turnout. The model's findings and limitations suggest avenues for further research and analysis that may assist the EAC and the states as they explore policies to balance the goals of ballot integrity and ballot access.

Our research included an examination of variation in turnout based on voter ID requirements in the 50 states and the District of Columbia. We examined this question using aggregate data at the county level gathered from the U.S. Census and other sources, and individual-level data from the November 2004 Current Population Survey.

Drawing from the research conducted by the Moritz College of Law, we were able to classify the states into one of five voter ID categories. Voters either had to:

1. state their name,
2. sign their name,
3. match their signatures to those already on file,
4. provide a non-photo ID,
5. provide a photo ID.

But election laws in numerous states offer exceptions to these requirements if individuals lack the necessary form of identification, and laws in those states set a minimum standard that a voter must meet in order to vote using a regular ballot (as opposed to a provisional ballot). Thus it is also possible to categorize states based on the minimum requirement for voting with a regular ballot. In 2004 the categories were somewhat different compared to the maximum requirement, in that none of the states required photo identification as a minimum standard for voting with a regular ballot. Four states, however, required voters to swear an affidavit as to their identity. The five categories for minimum requirements were:

1. stating one's name,
2. signing one's name,
3. matching one's signature to a signature on file,
4. providing a non-photo identification, or
5. swearing an affidavit.

Formatted: Bullets and Numbering

Analysis of the aggregate data showed that the average turnout in states requiring photo identification as a maximum requirement was 58.1 percent compared to 64.2 percent in states that required voters to give their name as the maximum requirement. The differences were slightly smaller when we examined states in terms of their minimum requirements, with 60.1 percent of voters turning out in states that required an affidavit compared to 63 percent in states that required voters to give their name as the minimum requirement.

The analyses of aggregate data also included models that controlled for other factors that might influence turnout, such as whether a county was in a presidential battleground state, the length of time between the close of the registration period and Election Day, and the demographic composition of the county in terms of race and ethnicity, age, and household income. Controlling for those factors, the maximum requirements of providing a signature match or a non-photo identification showed a negative effect on voter turnout when compared to counties in states that only required voters to give their names. None of the voter identification requirements showed an effect on turnout, however, in the model that coded counties according to the states' minimum requirements.

Analyses of the individual-level data from the November 2004 Current Population Survey also indicated relationships between voter ID requirements and turnout. Controlling for contextual factors, such as whether a voter resided in a presidential battleground state, and demographic characteristics, such as a voter's gender, race, ethnicity, age, and education, the data showed that registered voters in states that require photo identification as a maximum requirement were 2.9 percent less likely to say they had voted compared to registered voters in states that required voters to state their names. Examining states within the context of minimum identification requirements showed that registered voters in states requiring affidavits were four percent less likely to say they had voted compared to registered voters in states that required individuals to give their names at the polling place.

Breaking down the Current Population Survey sample by race and ethnicity also revealed interesting patterns. Photo identification and affidavit requirements were negatively associated with whether white registered voters said they voted compared to their counterparts in states requiring registered voters to give their names. But African-American, Hispanic, and Asian-American registered voters in states that required photo identification as the maximum requirement or an affidavit as the minimum requirement were no less likely to say they had voted than their racial or ethnic counterparts in states that simply required voters to give their names.

The most consistent difference emerged in states that required non-photo identification as a maximum or a minimum requirement. In five of six statistical models, African-American, Hispanic, and Asian-American registered voters in non-photo identification states were less likely to say they had voted in November 2004 than their racial or ethnic counterparts in states that required voters to state their names as a maximum or minimum identification requirement.

That the non-photo identification requirement was the most consistent in terms of statistical significance across the groups is intriguing given the intense debates surrounding photo identification requirements. This observation does not answer the question as to why photo identification requirements did not have a more uniform effect across groups in 2004. Of course, photo identification was a maximum requirement in only five states, and each of those states accepted another type of identification as a minimum requirement. But the finding that photo identification requirements were associated with a lower probability that white registered voters said they had voted, and the absence of a similar relationship within other racial and ethnic groups, runs counter to concerns expressed by some in the debate over voter ID. This finding points up the need for further research in this area, perhaps with a view to comparing turnout rates over time before and after a photo identification requirement takes effect, to further isolate potential relationships between photo ID requirements and turnout.

Deleted: It may have been due to the fact that

In examining the link between voter identification requirements and turnout, there is still much to learn. The data examined in this project could not capture the dynamics of how identification requirements might lower turnout. If these requirements dampen turnout, is it because individuals are aware of the requirements and stay away from the polls because they cannot or do not want to meet the requirements? Or, do the requirements result in some voters being turned away when they cannot meet the requirements on Election Day? The CPS data do not include measures that can answer this question. Knowing more about the "on the ground" experiences of voters concerning identification requirements could guide policy-makers at the state and local level in determining whether and at what point in the electoral cycle a concerted public information campaign might be most effective in helping voters to meet identification requirements.

Conclusions from the Research

The statistical analysis suggests that stricter voter ID requirements can be associated with lower turnout. It was not designed, however, to look at the other side of the balance equation: do tighter ID requirements reduce multiple voting or voting by ineligible voters? The scope of our research as defined by the EAC excluded assessing the dynamics and incidence of vote fraud.

Deleted: reduce

We believe, however, that sound policy on voter ID should begin with an examination of the tradeoffs between ballot security and ballot access.

The existing evidence on the incidence of vote fraud, especially on the kind of vote fraud that could be reduced by requiring more rigorous voter identification, is not sufficient to evaluate those tradeoffs. The EAC's recent study<sup>1</sup> of election crimes found, for example, that there has never been a comprehensive, nationwide study of voting fraud and intimidation.

Without a better understanding of the incidence of vote fraud and its relationship to voter ID, for now, best practice for the states may be to limit requirements for voter identification to the minimum needed to prevent duplicate registration and ensure eligibility. Election law should provide the clarity and certainty needed to forestall destabilizing challenges to election outcomes. Absent a sound, empirical basis for striking a wise balance between voter ID and ballot access, legal challenges may increase, not just to the process but to electoral outcomes.

The analysis of litigation conducted by the Moritz College of Law for our research suggests that the courts will look more strictly at requirements that voters produce a photo ID in order to cast a regular ballot, than at non-photo ID laws. The courts have used a balancing test to weigh the legitimate interest in preventing election fraud against the citizen's right to privacy (protecting Social Security numbers from public disclosure, for example) and the reasonableness of requirements for identity documents.

To strike that balance requires a more precise understanding of how voter ID requirements affect turnout. A first step in that direction would be to encourage or require states to collect and report additional data, including:

- The reasons potential voters are required to cast a provisional ballot and
- The reasons for rejecting provisional ballots.

Recommendations for consideration and action by the EAC

1. Encourage or sponsor further research to clarify the connection between voter ID requirements and the number of potential voters able to cast a ballot that is counted.
2. Recommend as a best practice the publication of a "Voting Impact Statement" by states as they assess their voter ID requirements. The analysis will help focus the attention of the public and policy-makers on the tradeoff between ballot access and ballot security. A "Voter Impact Statement," to be drafted and offered for public review and comment before the adoption of new identity requirements, would estimate the number and demographics of:
  - Eligible, potential voters who may be kept from the polls or permitted to cast a provisional ballot by a stricter ID requirement; and
  - Assess the number of ineligible voters who will be prevented from voting by the stricter ID requirements.

The data collection and analysis recommended in this report would help make feasible an empirically-based assessment of the effects on voter participation of proposed identification requirements. That assessment could improve the quality of the debate on this polarizing topic.

3. Encourage or require the states to collect and report reliable, credible information on the relationship between ballot access and ballot security. A compilation by EAC of this information would provide a factual basis for the states to consider as they estimate the incidence of the kinds of vote fraud that more stringent ID requirements may prevent. The studies should include precinct-level data to provide the fine-grained analysis that can provide a solid foundation for policy.
4. Encourage or require states to sponsor surveys of voters to be conducted by local election officials. Such surveys would determine why those who cast a provisional ballot were found ineligible to cast a regular ballot and illuminate the frequency with which ID issues divert voters into the provisional ballot line. The connection between Voter ID requirements and provisional ballots is, of course, close. Voters who lack required ID will likely vote provisionally, thus placing greater demands on a system that may be hard pressed to meet those demands. Asking voters what they know about ID requirements would also provide useful context for evaluating the effect of those requirements on electoral participation.<sup>2</sup>
5. Recommend as a best practice that state election officials conduct spot checks on how the identification process actually works at polling places. These spot checks could provide information on how closely actual practice tracks statutory or regulatory requirements.
6. Encourage states to examine the time period allowed for voters who cast a provisional ballot because they lacked required ID to return with their identification. In 11 states, voters who had to cast a provisional ballot because they lacked the ID required for a regular ballot were permitted to return later with their ID. Their provision of this ID is the critical step in evaluating the ballots. The length of the period in which the voter may return with ID is important. In setting the time period for return, which now varies among the states from the same day to about two weeks, states should consider three factors: the convenience of the voter, the total time allowed to evaluate ballots, and the safe harbor provision in presidential elections.

Deleted: should compile this information to

A final thought

A voting system that requires voters to produce an ID may prevent the ineligible from voting. It may also prevent some eligible voters from casting a ballot. If the ID requirements block a few ineligible voters from the polls at the cost of preventing an equal or greater number of eligible voters who cannot obtain or have left at home the required forms of identification, the integrity of the ballot may not have been improved; the harm may be as great as the benefit.

Deleted: the

Ultimately, a normative evaluation of whether a state should adopt a stricter voter ID requirement (and what form that requirement should take) will weigh value judgments as well as available factual evidence. We did our work on the premise that increased understanding of the facts relating to the imposition of voter ID requirements, based on available data and statistical analysis of that data, can help inform the policy process.

<sup>2</sup> Arizona held its first election with its new, stricter ID requirements on March 14, 2006. In at least one county (Maricopa) election officials handed a survey to voters that asked if they knew about the voter identification law and if they did, how they found out about it.

We hope that premise is realistic, and we also hope that this research has helped the Commissioners and the interested public to clarify their thinking on this polarizing topic.

U.S. ELECTION ASSISTANCE COMMISSION
BOARD of ADVISORS

RESOLUTION 2007-[#]

Whereas, the Election Assistance Commission is an agency of the United States federal government created by the Help America Vote Act; and

Whereas, the working group met in May 2006 and heard an initial verbal presentation of information to be included in a report on Voter Fraud and Voter Intimidation and made specific recommendations for the content of the report;

Whereas, the Voter Fraud and Intimidation Report was submitted to the EAC on or about July 2006, but was not released to the public.

Whereas, on or about October 2006, Barbara Arnwine wrote a letter of complaint regarding the failure to timely release this Report noting that these issues are of utmost importance to the fair administration of elections; and

Whereas, the EAC released in December 2006, a severely edited version of the Voter Fraud and Intimidation Report to the public; and

Whereas, these issues of Voter Fraud and Intimidation have become the justification for many states' passage of voter identification and citizenship laws.

Now Therefore, Be It Resolved that the Board of Advisors recommends to the United States Election Assistance Commission that it release the original Voter Fraud and Intimidation Report to the public; and,

In the Alternative, Be It Resolved that the Board of Advisors recommends to the United States Election Assistance Commission that the EAC release the Voter Fraud and Intimidation Report to the EAC Board of Advisors for its review.

A True Record Attest:

_____
Christopher M. Thomas
Chair of the Board of Advisors

Submitted by Barbara Arnwine

Approved as to Form by Resolution committee _____

Passed on _____ by a vote of _____ with _____ members not voting.

BOARD of ADVISORS

RESOLUTION 2006-01

Whereas, The Election Assistance Commission has commissioned a study of provisional voting;

And Whereas, The Election Assistance Commission Board of Advisors heard a presentation on the draft report on provisional voting;

And Whereas, the draft report failed to account for differences in how states utilize or do not utilize provisional ballots for NVRA fail-safe voting;

And Whereas, the draft report contains an unsubstantiated estimate of the number of voters who failed to receive provisional ballots yet the report contains a conclusion based on that unsubstantiated estimate;

Be It Resolved, that the Board of Advisors recommends that the Election Assistance Commission not accept the study of provisional voting for the time being; in such event that the Commission decides to go forward with this particular study,

Then, Be It Resolved, that the Board of Advisors recommends that the Election Assistance Commission not publish this report until the report is revised to account for differences in how states implement fail-safe voting and the removal of unsubstantiated estimates from the report;

And, Be It Further Resolved, that the Election Assistance Commission Board of Advisors appoints a subcommittee to review a revised draft report on provisional voting prior to publication by the Election Assistance Commission.

U.S. ELECTION ASSISTANCE COMMISSION
BOARD of ADVISORS

RESOLUTION 2006-02

Whereas, The Election Assistance Commission's important role in election research needs to be with research that fairly and equitably and bipartisanship published studies on various election issues;

And Whereas, any study conducted by the Election Assistance Commission needs to provide an opportunity for, and a method of, review of controlled studies so that alternative viewpoints are included and published as a part of the contracted study in order to assure that official studies of the Election Assistance Commission do have balance when published;

And Whereas, this is not intended to direct the Election Assistance Commission to publish studies on which the Commission cannot reach consensus;

Therefore, Be It Resolved, that the Board of Advisors recommends to the Election Assistance Commission that it require all studies to be reviewed by the Advisory Board and the Standards Board and on any study where there is substantial concern, that the studies be withheld until such time as representatives of those bodies can develop and deliver alternative viewpoints included with the studies.

006232

STANDARDS BOARD

RESOLUTION 2006-01

WHEREAS, the U.S. Election Assistance Commission is conducting studies and research on a wide variety of subjects related to elections.

RESOLVED that the Standards Board recommends—

- The EAC carefully review each study and recommendation of researchers to ensure that findings are based on facts that are clearly defended by quantitative data, rather than suspicions or assumptions;
- The EAC require researchers to study and report on the practicality and expense of implementing each recommendation;
- Election Day survey questions be considered and completed and noticed to states no later than two years before the election in which the data is to be collected.

U.S. ELECTION ASSISTANCE COMMISSION

RESOLUTION 2006-03

WHEREAS, the Help America Vote Act requires the EAC to report on finite and specific topics that are clearly listed in the law;

WHEREAS, Taxpayer dollars are being used to prepare these reports at a great deal of expense in terms of funding and time,

WHEREAS, the EAC itself is not performing the Research, but instead contracting out such research to various individuals, policy institutes, think tanks, and/or activist groups,

RESOLVED that the Standards Board recommends:

- That the EAC adhere strictly to the plain language meaning of the Help America Vote Act, where it clearly lists the specific topics that are to be reported on and the parameters thereof, without assuming tangential issues or taking action that would lead to an increased project scope;
- That the EAC recognize that the wide disparity of state election laws may make quantitative analysis difficult depending on the subject being discussed. As a result, there is value in recognizing this fact alone and where this is the case, federal and taxpayer funds should not be used in making assumptions that cannot be carried in a nationwide forum;

- That the EAC has a role in promulgating limited guidance in those areas specifically enumerated in Title III of HAVA, and otherwise the EAC is simply acting as a nationwide clearinghouse of state election practices. These EAC roles should be clearly enunciated on all EAC final and interim reports (through, for example; preambulatory language or “Draft” watermarks on each page) and should be clearly emphasized to the media and public in any statements or communication made by the EAC or its Commissioners.

Dear Tova,

I am working with Peggy Sims in order to set a date for the Voting Fraud/Voter Intimidation Project Working Group. I have been trying to reach Barbara Arnwine in order to find out which days in May she is potentially available to attend this meeting but all of my attempts have been unsuccessful.

I would appreciate any help that you could provide in this matter.

Subject Re: Working Group-Perez

As you may recall, the Commissioners directed me to find a nonpartisan local election official to serve on the Working Group. The three of us discussed the desirability of having a Hispanic. I proposed that I find someone from Texas because of that State's colorful history of voting fraud and their innovative approaches to combat it. In those Texas counties that hire Election Administrators to run elections, rather than having elected officials do so (Tax Assessor for voter registration; County Clerk for balloting), the Election Administrator is hired by the County Election Commission and is supposed to perform his or her duties in a nonpartisan manner. (See attached excerpts from Texas Election Code regarding election administrator hiring and restrictions on partisan activity.)

Any experienced Texas election official will be familiar with voting fraud and voter intimidation schemes used in that State. Mr. Perez has over 13 years experience as a county Election Administrator in Texas. You won't find many news articles mentioning him because he has kept his nose clean. (The Texas press, as in many other parts of the country, prefers to report bad news.) Mr. Perez is plugged into the association of Texas election officials and the two largest organizations of election officials in this country: the International Association of Clerks, Recorders, Election Officials and Treasurers (IACREOT); and The Election Center. He is a past President and past Chairman of the Legislative Committee for the Texas Association of Election Administrators. He currently serves on IACREOT's Election Officials Committee, which plans the educational sessions for election officials that are conducted at that organization's conferences. His peers in IACREOT and The Election Center have selected his submissions on web presentations (IACREOT) and his professional practices papers (Election Center) for awards. Mr. Perez also has access to information from other States through his membership in IACREOT and The Election Center. He also has a sense of humor, which you will note if you access the staff web page on the Guadalupe County Elections web site and hear the Mission Impossible theme .. something that might be useful in the upcoming meeting.

Guadalupe County is small but growing. In 2004, the county had over 65 thousand registered voters (a number more than doubled the number of registered voters in 1988). A third of the county's population claims Hispanic or Latino origin, according to the U.S. Census Bureau. The county is in south central Texas and is bordered by Comal, Hays, Cladwell, Gonzales, Wilson, and Bexar counties. In the 1980s, the county was predominately a farming community; but in recent years, many people have moved from San Antonio (Bexar County) to Guadalupe County, preferring to live in Guadalupe County and work in Bexar County.

Peg - -

I have read over the materials you sent to me and viewed the pieces on the CD.

I have only one correction:

I did not say that offenders who receive target letters routinely request - - or routinely receive - - audiences here at DOJHQ. That is very rare. Instead, what usually happens is that once a subject for an election fraud investigation is advised that he or she is going to be charged that person usually enters into plea negotiations and ultimately pleads guilty. Very few federal election fraud cases go to trial. When a subject does request a HQ interview or a HW hearing, it would be held in the first instance by myself. But again, Peg, that is rare.

Also, while the occurrences of prosecutions of isolated instances of felons and alien voters and double voters has increased, we still aggressively and I believe quite successfully pursue systematic schemes to corrupt the electoral process, as the cases we brought recently out of Knott and Pike Counties in Kentucky, those we brought out of Lincoln and Logan Counties in West Virginia, and those we brought in New Hampshire growing out of the jamming of get-out-the-vote phone bank lines attest.

I think they are panicking because they are preparing to travel tomorrow and may not have time to submit a revised version. They also are resisting changes to their interview summaries because the summaries represent what they think they heard. I was there at the interview and I heard what you said. I'm not sure that either of them heard everything (including the nuances) because so much of the information was new to them and it was one of their earlier interviews. I'm sorry I did not catch the defects before the summary went out.

My first concern is ensuring that the Working Group has the correct information. Then, we can deal with what version, if any, goes in the final report. Do you want me to excerpt the corrections from your email and submit them to the Working Group? --- Peggy

Would you please take a look at the attached? I combined both of your definitions, reformatted the list, removed a reference to the fraud having to have an actual impact on the election results (because fraud can be prosecuted without proving that it actually changed the results of the election), and taken out a couple of vague examples (e.g.; reference to failing to enforce state laws --- because there may be legitimate reasons for not doing so).

Subject RE: Your Materials

The first item is not as big a deal as the second one: the processes under which subjects of investigations come to Jesus is not as important as the overall assessment of our law enforcement achievements. But stressing the isolated test cases we brought - - and will continue to bring - - to deter things like felon voting, alien voting and double voting, which not mentioning such significant achievements as the five case PROJECTS mentioned in my last e-mail - - misrepresents what we are doing and the deterrent message we are trying to communicate.

I appreciate that these two young people may have found themselves in a Brave New World when they came over here. It showed in their questioning. But the fact that criminal law enforcement is not at all similar to preventative legal relief (as under the Voting Rights Act) or civil relief (as election contest litigation) is I guess more of a problem than I at first foresaw. My real concern is that the civil rights groups - - with whom we over here have an amazing amount of common grounds - - will take the singling out of the felon and alien voter cases as evincing a malevolent aggression on their constituencies. That is not the case. We are only enforcing the law.

Subject Request to interview AUSAs

Peg --

At the Advisory Board meeting we had last week, your two contractors asked to interview the over-100 AUSAs who are serving as District Election Officers in connection with the Fraud study.

This request needs to be addressed to Natalie Voris of EOUSA per the message from here that follows.

If the contractors require additional information in connection with the Fraud Study, and should EOUSA not be able to satisfy their needs n they can communicate with me on criminal issues and Cameron Quinn on Civil Rights issues.

I will be here when you arrive later today at the Board of Advisors meeting when you arrive to talk to us at 4:30.

Ms. Voris' message follows:

Per the USAM, all requests for interviews/surveys/research projects that involve USAOs must be approved by EOUSA. I am pasting the provision below - the contact name needs to be updated. Requests should come to me, as the Acting Counsel to the Director.

006251

Thanks,

Thank you for this, Peg.

The third bullet point is one I embrace fully. We lack the statutory tool to do the job. Hopefully, that can be remedied through legislation. But as things stand today large loopholes in the federal legal matrix addressing electoral abuse and fraud exist - - particularly when such abuses occur in elections where there were no federal candidates on the ballot.

Here is the content of the email attachment:

Existing Research Analysis

There are many reports and books that describe anecdotes and draw broad conclusions from a large array of incidents. There is little research that is truly systematic or scientific. The most systematic look at fraud is the report written by Lori Minnite. The most systematic look at voter intimidation is the report by Laughlin McDonald. Books written about this subject seem to all have a political bias and a pre-existing agenda that makes them somewhat less valuable.

Researchers agree that measuring something like the incidence of fraud and intimidation in a scientifically legitimate way is extremely difficult from a methodological perspective and would require resources beyond the means of most social and political scientists. As a result, there is much more written on this topic by advocacy groups than social scientists. It is hoped that this gap will be filled in the "second phase" of this EAC project.

Moreover, reports and books make allegations but, perhaps by their nature, have little follow up. As a result, it is difficult to know when something has remained in the stage of being an allegation and gone no further, or progressed to the point of being investigated or prosecuted or in any other way proven to be valid by an independent, neutral entity. This is true, for example, with respect to allegations of voter intimidation by civil rights organizations, and, with respect to fraud, John Fund's frequently cited book. Again, this is something that it is hoped will be addressed in the "second phase" of this EAC project by doing follow up research on allegations made in reports, books and newspaper articles.

Other items of note:

- There is as much evidence, and as much concern, about structural forms of disenfranchisement as about intentional abuse of the system. These include felon disenfranchisement, poor maintenance of databases and identification requirements.
- There is tremendous disagreement about the extent to which polling place fraud, e.g. double voting, intentional felon voting, noncitizen voting, is a serious problem. On balance, more researchers find it to be less of a problem than is commonly described in the political debate, but some reports say it is a major problem, albeit hard to identify.
- There is substantial concern across the board about absentee balloting and the opportunity it presents for fraud.
- Federal law governing election fraud and intimidation is varied and complex and yet may nonetheless be insufficient or subject to too many limitations to be as effective as it might be.
- Deceptive practices, e.g. targeted flyers and phone calls providing misinformation, were a major problem in 2004.
- Voter intimidation continues to be focused on minority communities, although the American Center for Voting Rights uniquely alleges it is focused on Republicans.

You have most of the pieces of the report now. We absolutely need to put the statutory authority for the research up front. We need to add the definition. We also need to add a short piece addressing the approach for this preliminary research (including short statements on the pros and cons of information sources --- you began to address this in the literature review summary). I expect that the biggest project will be fleshing out the possible avenues for subsequent research in this area. It would be great if we could come up with cost estimates. If we can't, we need to at least identify what info we hope to get, what we are likely to miss, and any pitfalls.

Given today's roast, I will take another look at what we have now to highlight remarks that might needlessly tick board members off. We can discuss whether or not editing or removing the remark would be detrimental to or have no real effect on the final report. (An example of such a remark is the reference to the number of articles out of Florida. A local official from that State objected on the grounds that the number of articles does not reliably indicate the number of problems.) I know we can expect a challenge from Board of Advisors member Craig Donsanto regarding the focus of the Election Crimes Branch prosecutions.

Yes, we can discuss the organization and "look" of the report after Job returns. Yes, the Commissioners will want to review it and submit their changes before the report goes to the boards.

It is too early to tell what EAC efforts may be mounted in FY 2007. I doubt that fire from the Standards Board will prevent Commissioners from doing what they think is needed. But, given that it is an election year, appropriations legislation may not be signed until December or later -- so we won't know how much money we have for awhile. --- Peggy

Subject: Re: presentation

I'm glad it is over --- for now. One audience was a lot tougher than the other. The Standards Board was much more critical of the research than the Board of Advisors.

Of course, the Board of Advisors is the body that wanted EAC to place a high priority on the research. Its members were interested in sharing personal experiences (including problems with getting anyone to prosecute) and observations (that we need to expand the research to give Congress and political parties a better picture of how rare or prevalent are voting fraud and intimidation, that the HAVA-mandated statewide voter registration lists should help to prevent fraud, etc.). They also asked if EAC will look at specific opportunities for fraud (using cell phones in vote buying schemes to photograph the ballot being cast at the poll) and how the agency will research voter intimidation/suppression involving voters with disabilities (advocates want to pass on complaints received).

The members of the Standards Board focused much more on the scope of the research and the completeness and accuracy of the information gleaned. Some wanted to include campaign finance crimes in the mix; others understood why we did not. Several did not like the use of newspaper articles, or were defensive about references to the large number of articles about their State. They made the point that, given the vagaries of the press, EAC should not use the number of articles about a specific State or particular vote fraud/intimidation activity as a basis for determining the likelihood that problems will occur in a given State or the frequency with which certain activities occur. (I never said that we did, but some members thought it was at least implied.) Some members want more research on the topic (into prosecutions and/or unsuccessful referrals made by election officials to law enforcement agencies); others want us to "quit throwing away tax dollars" and to stop the research altogether. Although my first slide noted our statutory authority to conduct this study, several members challenged EAC's right to do so --- saying that DOJ, not EAC, should conduct such research.

The dueling approaches of these boards may give us heartburn when the time comes for them to review and comment on the draft. We will have to make a strong statement at the beginning, perhaps repeated at the end, that this is preliminary research. We also may need to thoroughly explain how choices were made regarding what to look at, who to interview, etc. We may need to clearly acknowledge both the strengths and weaknesses of the various sources of information used in the preliminary research. Finally, when reviewing ideas for subsequent research, we may need to discuss the pros and cons of each approach, what additional information we expect to retrieve, and, perhaps, the estimated cost.

By the way, I did clarify the polling place fraud bullet. --- Peg

This is a complicated issue largely because of two things: 1) there is a lot of ambiguity out there as to what constitutes "intimidation." To the civil rights community, "intimidation" means anything that makes voting uncomfortable or less than automatic. To us in the criminal law enforcement "intimidation" means threats of economic or physical nature made to force or prevent voting. Only the latter involve aggravating factors that warrant putting offenders in jail, and the statutes that address "intimidation" from a criminal perspective are thus limited. We have never had many "intimidation" criminal cases. For one thing, in this modern post voting rights era, there is not a lot of physical/economic duress out there in the voting context - - at least not that I have seen. For another, where it does occur it is very hard to investigate and detect as victims who have been physically or economically intimidated are not likely to come to the FBI.

The bottom line is that we take matters that do present predication for physical or economically based "intimidation" very seriously, AND that we are being extremely proactive in trying to find ways to prosecute matters involving voter suppression as in the Tobin cases in New Hampshire where the local GOP tried to jam telephone lines for a GOTV effort run by the Dems. But even there - - the usual "suppression" matter involves flyers that are passed around giving out misleading information about an election, and we have investigated every one of those that came to our attention last elect ion cycle. We were not able to identify the person(s) responsible for printing the misleading flyers in any of these. But we sure as heck tried.

I'm putting the finishing touches on a status report to the EAC Standards Board and EAC Board of Advisors on our Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation research project. For the most part, I am using our consultants summaries for the report, but one bullet under the interview summaries is giving me heartburn. It is the bullet that references the decrease in DOJ voter intimidation actions. It is one of the places in which our consultants had indicated that your office is focussing on prosecuting individuals. I have reworded it and would like your feedback on the revision:

Several people indicate - including representatives from DOJ -- that for various reasons, the Department of Justice is bringing fewer voter intimidation and suppression cases now, and has increased its focus on matters such as noncitizen voting, double voting, and felon voting. While the Voting Section of the Civil Rights Division focuses on systemic patterns of malfeasance, the Election Crimes Branch of the Public Integrity Section has increased prosecutions of individual instances of felon, alien, and double voting while also maintaining an aggressive pursuit of systematic schemes to corrupt the electoral process.

Please suggest any changes that you think would further clarify the current approach. --- Peggy

Subject Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Working Group

Dear Working Group Members and Participants:

You should receive a packet of information today, either by Federal Express or hand delivery, concerning Thursday's meeting of the project Working Group for EAC's Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation research project. Attached is an analysis of the consultants' research into relevant literature and reports. This summary was not available when we prepared the information packets last Friday, but may be of interest to you. Our consultants and I look forward to having a productive discussion with you.

I haven't really looked into it. I know that contractors and grantee's can order food and have the government pay for it if the meeting is to disseminate information. Logic dictates that we can do the same, but I am not sure of the process. I have been here when we ordered lunch for meetings. Diana would be the one to ask. Perhaps the contractor can pay for it and put it on their next invoice but the COTR for the contract would have to be in the loop on this call.

I am working on the snacks. I just ordered the coffee (reg/decaf). Cafe Mozart is faxing over an invoice and we can pick up a few boxes of cookies from there too.

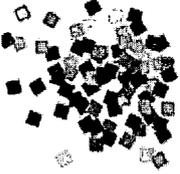

GAYLIN-Adam said that you had looked into the way of getting reimbursed for paying for the break foods/coffees that are provided at these meetings? Any ideas?

I'll have a better idea of the final list after I brief Commissioners tomorrow morning. Devon noted that they used only tent cards for the Asian Language Working Group. Below is Craig's response to the request to interview AUSAs. It does not appear that this avenue is likely because the AUSAs are so busy..

Also, he asked about permission for other folks to attendi the election crimes training session, and the answer was "no". (I can't even get in, and I'm a federal employee.). I understand that a good part of the reason is practical -- they are having enough trouble accommodating the folks that are required to come.

Peg --

At the Advisory Board meeting we had last week, your two contractors asked to interview the over-100 AUSAs who are serving as District Election Officers in connection with the Fraud study.

This request needs to be addressed to Natalie Voris of EOUSA per the message from here that follows.

If the contractors require additional information in connection with the Fraud Study, and should EOUSA not be able to satisfy their needs n they can communicate with me on criminal issues and Cameron Quinn on Civil Rights issues.

I will be here when you arrive later today at the Board of Advisors meeting when you arrive to talk to us at 4:30.

Ms. Voris' message follows:

Per the USAM, all requests for interviews/surveys/research projects that involve USAOs must be approved by EOUSA. I am pasting the provision below - the contact name needs to be updated. Requests should come to me, as the Acting Counsel to the Director.

Thanks,

Subject: Report on Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation Research

Craig:

I'm putting the finishing touches on a status report to the EAC Standards Board and EAC Board of Advisors on our Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation research project. For the most part, I am using our consultants summaries for the report, but one bullet under the interview summaries is giving me heartburn. It is the bullet that references the decrease in DOJ voter intimidation actions. It is one of the places in which our consultants had indicated that your office is focussing on prosecuting individuals. I have reworded it and would like your feedback on the revision:

Several people indicate - including representatives from DOJ -- that for various reasons, the Department of Justice is bringing fewer voter intimidation and suppression cases now, and has increased its focus on matters such as noncitizen voting, double voting, and felon voting. While the Voting Section of the Civil Rights Division focuses on systemic patterns of malfeasance, the Election Crimes Branch of the Public Integrity Section has increased prosecutions of individual instances of felon, alien, and double voting while also maintaining an aggressive pursuit of systematic schemes to corrupt the electoral process.

Please suggest any changes that you think would further clarify the current approach. --- Peggy

Subject Re: presentation

I'm glad it is over --- for now. One audience was a lot tougher than the other. The Standards Board was much more critical of the research than the Board of Advisors.

Of course, the Board of Advisors is the body that wanted EAC to place a high priority on the research. Its members were interested in sharing personal experiences (including problems with getting anyone to prosecute) and observations (that we need to expand the research to give Congress and political parties a better picture of how rare or prevalent are voting fraud and intimidation, that the HAVA-mandated statewide voter registration lists should help to prevent fraud, etc.). They also asked if EAC will look at specific opportunities for fraud (using cell phones in vote buying schemes to photograph the ballot being cast at the poll) and how the agency will research voter intimidation/suppression involving voters with disabilities (advocates want to pass on complaints received).

The members of the Standards Board focused much more on the scope of the research and the completeness and accuracy of the information gleaned. Some wanted to include campaign finance crimes in the mix; others understood why we did not. Several did not like the use of newspaper articles, or were defensive about references to the large number of articles about their State. They made the point that, given the vagaries of the press, EAC should not use the number of articles about a specific State or particular vote fraud/intimidation activity as a basis for determining the likelihood that problems will occur in a given State or the frequency with which certain activities occur. (I never said that we did, but some members thought it was at least implied.) Some members want more research on the topic (into prosecutions and/or unsuccessful referrals made by election officials to law enforcement agencies); others want us to "quit throwing away tax dollars" and to stop the research altogether. Although my first slide noted our statutory authority to conduct this study, several members challenged EAC's right to do so --- saying that DOJ, not EAC, should conduct such research.

The dueling approaches of these boards may give us heartburn when the time comes for them to review and comment on the draft. We will have to make a strong statement at the beginning, perhaps repeated at the end, that this is preliminary research. We also may need to thoroughly explain how choices were made regarding what to look at, who to interview, etc. We may need to clearly acknowledge both the strengths and weaknesses of the various sources of information used in the preliminary research. Finally, when reviewing ideas for subsequent research, we may need to discuss the pros and cons of each approach, what additional information we expect to retrieve, and, perhaps, the estimated cost.

By the way, I did clarify the polling place fraud bullet. --- Peg

I guess it goes to the commissioners first anyway. Does this portend anything for phase 2? Thanks Peg. Tova

Peg - -

I have read over the materials you sent to me and viewed the pieces on the CD.

I have only one correction:

I did not say that offenders who receive target letters routinely request - - or routinely receive - - audiences here at DOJHQ. That is very rare. Instead, what usually happens is that once a subject for an election fraud investigation is advised that he or she is going to be charged that person usually enters into plea negotiations and ultimately pleads guilty. Very few federal election fraud cases go to trial. When a subject does request a HQ interview or a HW hearing, it would be held in the first instance by myself. But again, Peg, that is rare.

Also, while the occurrences of prosecutions of isolated instances of felons and alien voters and double voters has increased, we still aggressively and I believe quite successfully pursue systematic schemes to corrupt the electoral process, as the cases we brought recently out of Knott and Pike Counties in Kentucky, those we brought out of Lincoln and Logan Counties in West Virginia, and those we brought in New Hampshire growing out of the jamming of get0-out-the-vote phone bank lines attest.

What is the information you need when you say:
The consultants jointly selected experts from ???

We chose the interviewees by first coming up with a list of the categories of types of people we wanted to interview. Then we each filled those categories with a certain number of people, equally. The ultimate categories were academics, advocates, elections officials, lawyers and judges.

Is that what you need?

Hello to all,

I would love to help, but I will not be in the office from today (Monday, May 15th) thru Wednesday, May 17th ----- I'll be back on Thursday morning. When is your meeting taking place? I had e-mailed Adam a draft of the table tents I did for the APIA working group; perhaps he still has it archived in his Lotus notes and could forward it to you. All you would have to do then is erase the APIA names and insert the ones for the new working group. In case he does not have the document I sent him and you need them prior to me returning to the office ---- in Microsoft Word, open a new document, go under Tools, then labels and envelopes, choose Labels and then Options -- then choose the correct Avery product number for your tent cards and click New document -- this will bring a blank template where you can begin to insert the names. I hope this helps. I can be reached by phone at (610) 780-8551 in case you need my help. Also, the tent card box usually brings an instruction sheet , it's not the most clear though.

I've been thinking that it might be better to make a separate submission for the travel costs. That way, if there are any delays in receiving your receipts, or there are any corrections or clarifications needed on the travel costs, we won't have to hold up the voucher for payment of personal services. Peg - -

I have read over the materials you sent to me and viewed the pieces on the CD.

I have only one correction:

I did not say that offenders who receive target letters routinely request - - or routinely receive - - audiences here at DOJHQ. That is very rare. Instead, what usually happens is that once a subject for an election fraud investigation is advised that he or she is going to be charged that person usually enters into plea negotiations and ultimately pleads guilty. Very few federal election fraud cases go to trial. When a subject does request a HQ interview or a HW hearing, it would be held in the first instance by myself. But again, Peg, that is rare.

Also, while the occurrences of prosecutions of isolated instances of felons and alien voters and double voters has increased, we still aggressively and I believe quite successfully pursue systematic schemes to corrupt the electoral process, as the cases we brought recently out of Knott and Pike Counties in Kentucky, those we brought out of Lincoln and Logan Counties in West Virginia, and those we brought in New Hampshire growing out of the jamming of get-out-the-vote phone bank lines attest.

Existing Research Analysis

There are many reports and books that describe anecdotes and draw broad conclusions from a large array of incidents. There is little research that is truly systematic or scientific. The most systematic look at fraud is the report written by Lori Minnite. The most systematic look at voter intimidation is the report by Laughlin McDonald. Books written about this subject seem to all have a political bias and a pre-existing agenda that makes them somewhat less valuable.

Researchers agree that measuring something like the incidence of fraud and intimidation in a scientifically legitimate way is extremely difficult from a methodological perspective and would require resources beyond the means of most social and political scientists. As a result, there is much more written on this topic by advocacy groups than social scientists. It is hoped that this gap will be filled in the "second phase" of this EAC project.

Moreover, reports and books make allegations but, perhaps by their nature, have little follow up. As a result, it is difficult to know when something has remained in the stage of being an allegation and gone no further, or progressed to the point of being investigated or prosecuted or in any other way proven to be valid by an independent, neutral entity. This is true, for example, with respect to allegations of voter intimidation by civil rights organizations, and, with respect to fraud, John Fund's frequently cited book. Again, this is something that it is hoped will be addressed in the "second phase" of this EAC project by doing follow up research on allegations made in reports, books and newspaper articles.

Other items of note:

- There is as much evidence, and as much concern, about structural forms of disenfranchisement as about intentional abuse of the system. These include felon disenfranchisement, poor maintenance of databases and identification requirements.
- There is tremendous disagreement about the extent to which polling place fraud, e.g. double voting, intentional felon voting, noncitizen voting, is a serious problem. On balance, more researchers find it to be less of a problem than is commonly described in the political debate, but some reports say it is a major problem, albeit hard to identify.
- There is substantial concern across the board about absentee balloting and the opportunity it presents for fraud.
- Federal law governing election fraud and intimidation is varied and complex and yet may nonetheless be insufficient or subject to too many limitations to be as effective as it might be.

006306

- Deceptive practices, e.g. targeted flyers and phone calls providing misinformation, were a major problem in 2004.
- Voter intimidation continues to be focused on minority communities, although the American Center for Voting Rights uniquely alleges it is focused on Republicans.

Let me try to do it, Peg. Again what I do not want to see occur is for the LCCR to start attacking us. We have more in common with them than I had originally assumed, thanks to the write-ups of their interviews. We need to promote what we have in common not try to score political points. But I will try to correct the records as long as you will agree you heard what I said the way I know I said it!

The first item is not as big a deal as the second one: the processes under which subjects of investigations come to Jesus is not as important as the overall assessment of our law enforcement achievements. But stressing the isolated test cases we brought - - and will continue to bring - - to deter things like felon voting, alien voting and double voting, which not mentioning such significant achievements as the five case PROJECTS mentioned in my last e-mail - - misrepresents what we are doing and the deterrent message we are trying to communicate.

I appreciate that these two young people may have found themselves in a Brave New World when they came over here. It showed in their questioning. But the fact that criminal law enforcement is not at all similar to preventative legal relief (as under the Voting Rights Act) or civil relief (as election contest litigation) is I guess more of a problem than I at first foresaw. My real concern is that the civil rights groups - - with whom we over here have an amazing amount of common grounds - - will take the singling out of the felon and alien voter cases as evincing a malevolent aggression on their constituencies. That is not the case. We are only enforcing the law.

I think they are panicking because they are preparing to travel tomorrow and may not have time to submit a revised version. They also are resisting changes to their interview summaries because the summaries represent what they think they heard. I was there at the interview and I heard what you said. I'm not sure that either of them heard everything (including the nuances) because so much of the information was new to them and it was one of their earlier interviews. I'm sorry I did not catch the defects before the summary went out.

My first concern is ensuring that the Working Group has the correct information. Then, we can deal with what version, if any, goes in the final report. Do you want me to excerpt the corrections from your email and submit them to the Working Group? --- Peggy

Peg - -

I have read over the materials you sent to me and viewed the pieces on the CD.

I have only one correction:

I did not say that offenders who receive target letters routinely request - - or routinely receive - - audiences here at DOJHQ. That is very rare. Instead, what usually happens is that once a subject for an election fraud investigation is advised that he or she is going to be charged that person usually enters into plea negotiations and ultimately pleads guilty. Very few federal election fraud cases go to trial. When a subject does request a HQ interview or a HW hearing, it would be held in the first instance by myself. But again, Peg, that is rare.

Also, while the occurrences of prosecutions of isolated instances of felons and alien voters and double voters has increased, we still aggressively and I believe quite successfully pursue systematic schemes to corrupt the electoral process, as the cases we brought recently out of Knott and Pike Counties in Kentucky, those we brought out of Lincoln and Logan Counties in West Virginia, and those we brought in New Hampshire growing out of the jamming of get0-out-the-vote phone bank lines attest.

I think he can just raise these points at the meeting, no? I'm sure many we interviewed would say we misquoted them on something. This is what both Job and I remember him saying. I think it would be unfair for him to change/amend his interview without giving the same opportunity to the other interviewees.

Subject Your Materials

Peg --

006318

I have read over the materials you sent to me and viewed the pieces on the CD.

I have only one correction:

I did not say that offenders who receive target letters routinely request - - or routinely receive - - audiences here at DOJHQ. That is very rare. Instead, what usually happens is that once a subject for an election fraud investigation is advised that he or she is going to be charged that person usually enters into plea negotiations and ultimately pleads guilty. Very few federal election fraud cases go to trial. When a subject does request a HQ interview or a HW hearing, it would be held in the first instance by myself. But again, Peg, that is rare.

Also, while the occurrences of prosecutions of isolated instances of felons and alien voters and double voters has increased, we still aggressively and I believe quite successfully pursue systematic schemes to corrupt the electoral process, as the cases we brought recently out of Knott and Pike Counties in Kentucky, those we brought out of Lincoln and Logan Counties in West Virginia, and those we brought in New Hampshire growing out of the jamming of get0-out-the-vote phone bank lines attest.

Let me try to do it, Peg. Again what I do not want to see occur is for the LCCR to start attacking us. We have more in common with them than I had originally assumed, thanks to the write-ups of their interviews. We need to promote what we have in common not try to score political points. But I will try to correct the records as long as you will agree you heard what I said the way I know I said it!

The first item is not as big a deal as the second one: the processes under which subjects of investigations come to Jesus is not as important as the overall assessment of our law enforcement achievements. But stressing the isolated test cases we brought - - and will continue to bring - - to deter things like felon voting, alien voting and double voting, which not mentioning such significant achievements as the five case PROJECTS mentioned in my last e-mail - - misrepresents what we are doing and the deterrent message we are trying to communicate.

I appreciate that these two young people may have found themselves in a Brave New World when they came over here. It showed in their questioning. But the fact that criminal law enforcement is not at all similar to preventative legal relief (as under the Voting Rights Act) or civil relief (as election contest litigation) is I guess more of a problem than I at first foresaw. My real concerns is that the civil rights groups - - with whom we over here have an amazing amount of common grounds - - will take the singling out of the felon and alien voter cases as evincing a malevolent aggression on their constituencies. That is not the case. We are only enforcing the law.

I think they are panicking because they are preparing to travel tomorrow and may not have time to submit a revised version. They also are resisting changes to their interview summaries because the summaries represent what they think they heard. I was there at the interview and I heard what you said. I'm not sure that either of them heard everything (including the nuances) because so much of the information was new to them and it was one of their earlier interviews. I'm sorry I did not catch the defects before the summary went out.

My first concern is ensuring that the Working Group has the correct information. Then, we can deal with what version, if any, goes in the final report. Do you want me to excerpt the corrections from your email and submit them to the Working Group? --- Peggy

Peg - -

I have read over the materials you sent to me and viewed the pieces on the CD.

I have only one correction:

I did not say that offenders who receive target letters routinely request - - or routinely receive - - audiences here at DOJHQ. That is very rare. Instead, what usually happens is that once a subject for an election fraud investigation is advised that he or she is going to be charged that person usually enters into plea negotiations and ultimately pleads guilty. Very few federal election fraud cases go to trial. When a subject does request a HQ interview or a HW hearing, it would be held in the first instance by myself. But again, Peg, that is rare.

Also, while the occurrences of prosecutions of isolated instances of felons and alien voters and double voters has increased, we still aggressively and I believe quite successfully pursue systematic schemes to corrupt the electoral process, as the cases we brought recently out of Knott and Pike Counties in Kentucky, those we brought out of Lincoln and Logan Counties in West Virginia, and those we brought in New Hampshire growing out of the jamming of get0-out-the-vote phone bank lines attest.

Let me try to do it, Peg. Again what I do not want to see occur is for the LCCR to start attacking us. We have more in common with them than I had originally assumed, thanks to the write-ups of their interviews. We need to promote what we have in common not try to score political points. But I will try to correct the records as long as you will agree you heard what I said the way I know I said it!

The first item is not as big a deal as the second one: the processes under which subjects of investigations come to Jesus is not as important as the overall assessment of our law enforcement achievements. But stressing the isolated test cases we brought - - and will continue to bring - - to deter things like felon voting, alien voting and double voting, which not mentioning such significant achievements as the five case PROJECTS mentioned in my last e-mail - - misrepresents what we are doing and the deterrent message we are trying to communicate.

I appreciate that these two young people may have found themselves in a Brave New World when they came over here. It showed in their questioning. But the fact that criminal law enforcement is not at all similar to preventative legal relief (as under the Voting Rights Act) or civil relief (as election contest litigation) is I guess more of a problem than I at first foresaw. My real concern is that the civil rights groups - - with whom we over here have an amazing amount of common grounds - - will take the singling out of the felon and alien voter cases as evincing a malevolent aggression on their constituencies. That is not the case. We are only enforcing the law.

I think they are panicking because they are preparing to travel tomorrow and may not have time to submit a revised version. They also are resisting changes to their interview summaries because the summaries represent what they think they heard. I was there at the interview and I heard what you said. I'm not sure that either of them heard everything (including the nuances) because so much of the information was new to them and it was one of their earlier interviews. I'm sorry I did not catch the defects before the summary went out.

My first concern is ensuring that the Working Group has the correct information. Then, we can deal with what version, if any, goes in the final report. Do you want me to excerpt the corrections from your email and submit them to the Working Group? --- Peggy

Peg - -

I have read over the materials you sent to me and viewed the pieces on the CD.

I have only one correction:

I did not say that offenders who receive target letters routinely request - - or routinely receive - - audiences here at DOJHQ. That is very rare. Instead, what usually happens is that once a subject for an election fraud investigation is advised that he or she is going to be charged that person usually enters into plea negotiations and ultimately pleads guilty. Very few federal election fraud cases go to trial. When a subject does request a HQ interview or a HW hearing, it would be held in the first instance by myself. But again, Peg, that is rare.

Also, while the occurrences of prosecutions of isolated instances of felons and alien voters and double voters has increased, we still aggressively and I believe quite successfully pursue systematic schemes to corrupt the electoral process, as the cases we brought recently out of Knott and Pike Counties in Kentucky, those we brought out of Lincoln and Logan Counties in West Virginia, and those we brought in

I think he can just raise these points at the meeting, no? I'm sure many we interviewed would say we misquoted them on something. This is what both Job and I remember him saying. I think it would be unfair for him to change/amend his interview without giving the same opportunity to the other interviewees.

Tova:

We can certainly discuss this at the Working Group meeting. (The draft definition had already been sent out by the time I read your message.) There may be other VRA provisions that should be considered as well, such as the prohibition on removing the names of certain registrants, who were registered by federal examiners, without obtaining prior approval of the Justice Department.

After I received your email, I asked Barry Weinberg to review the draft definition and consider if we have left off examples of Voting Rights Act violations that would qualify as election fraud. Barry, during his 25 years with DOJ, led aggressive action against attempts to place police at the polls to intimidate voters, challenges targeting minorities, failure to provide election materials and assistance in languages other than English (in covered jurisdictions), etc. His input should prove helpful. --- Peggy

Lets raise this issue at the meeting. (I'll add "DRAFT" to the current document.) My concern is that there are a number of requirements in the Voting Rights Act. Not all of them are considered election fraud, when violated. For example, failure to preclear changes in election procedures is not treated as election fraud, though it is actionable. --- Peggy

Would you please take a look at the attached? I combined both of your definitions, reformatted the list, removed a reference to the fraud having to have an actual impact on the election results (because fraud can be prosecuted without proving that it actually changed the results of the election), and taken out a couple of vague examples (e.g.; reference to failing to enforce state laws --- because there may be legitimate reasons for not doing so).

I have made contact with Ben Ginsberg's office and am waiting to hear if he accepts our invitation to join the working group. --- Peggy

Craig:

I'm putting the finishing touches on a status report to the EAC Standards Board and EAC Board of Advisors on our Voting Fraud-Voter Intimidation research project. For the most part, I am using our consultants summaries for the report, but one bullet under the interview summaries is giving me heartburn. It is the bullet that references the decrease in DOJ voter intimidation actions. It is one of the places in which our consultants had indicated that your office is focussing on prosecuting individuals. I have reworded it and would like your feedback on the revision:

Several people indicate - including representatives from DOJ -- that for various reasons, the Department of Justice is bringing fewer voter intimidation and suppression cases now, and has increased its focus on matters such as noncitizen voting, double voting, and felon voting. While the Voting Section of the Civil Rights Division focuses on systemic patterns of malfeasance, the Election Crimes Branch of the Public Integrity Section has increased prosecutions of individual instances of felon, alien, and double voting while also maintaining an aggressive pursuit of systematic schemes to corrupt the electoral process.

Please suggest any changes that you think would further clarify the current approach. --- Peggy

In reviewing your travel reimbursement request that arrived in my In box this week, I noticed that you did not include per diem in your request for payment. Was that an oversight? I calculate that you would be eligible for a total of $160 in per diem for the trip ( $48 for Wednesday 5/17, $64 for Thursday 5/18, and $48 for Friday 5/19). Also, the airfare receipt shows a total charge of $288.60, but the amount you requested for airfare was $293.60. Perhaps there was a service fee that does not show on the receipt. Can you clarify? --- Peggy

Analytic Tasks

- Identify how voter ID requirements were implemented around the county to provide a baseline for consideration of other approaches.
- Diagnose the problems and challenges of voter ID and hypothesize alternative approaches.
- Recommend alternative approaches
- Identify appropriate policy objectives by which to assess alternative approaches to voter ID

---

---

---

---

---

---

---

---

006363

Focus

- HAVA's narrow ID requirements drew attention to the issue and helped spark the current debate.
- National debate now goes beyond HAVA to focus on stricter ID for all would-be voters.
- Therefore our work takes a broad view of the issue.

---

---

---

---

---

---

Voter ID and Ballot Integrity

- Voter ID – a critical step in protecting the integrity of the ballot by checking that the potential voter is eligible and permitting the voter to cast a ballot and one ballot only.
- Ensuring ballot integrity requires a perspective that takes in the entire voting process.
- Requires more than preventing the ineligible from voting.
- Also should ensure that all those who are eligible and want to vote can cast a ballot that counts.

---

---

---

---

---

---

Vote Fraud Excluded From This Analysis

- Assessing the effectiveness of voter ID in preventing vote fraud should logically include an estimate of the nature and frequency of vote fraud.
- EAC commissioned a separate analysis of the incidence of vote fraud.
- Our analysis does not take into account how many potential voters who did not turn out under comparatively stricter voter ID requirements might have been ineligible or eligible to vote.

Method of analysis

- Collected and analyzed state statutes and regulations & classified states by their ID requirements in 2004.
- Tested the assumption that voter ID requirements would prove to be increasingly demanding on the voter with providing photo ID the most rigorous.
- County-level turnout data and Current Population Survey results
- Analyzed litigation for trends in judicial decisions
- Revised our work based on comments of PRG

Categories of Voter ID in the states, 2004

1. Give Name
2. Sign Name
3. Match Signature
4. Present ID
5. Photo ID

In 2004 no states required photo ID as the only ID to cast regular ballot.
May not reflect actual practice at the polling place.

---

---

---

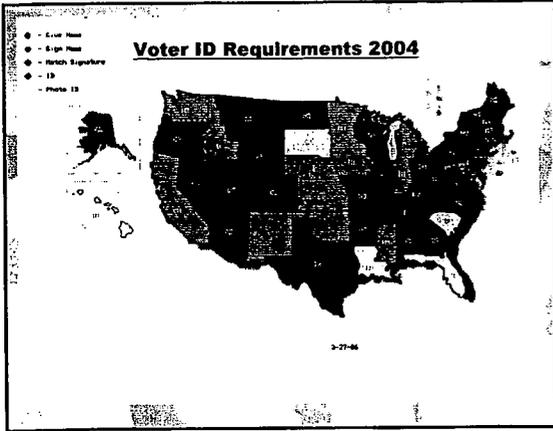

---

Limitations of the data

- 2004 data do not permit conclusions about the effect of stricter photo ID laws such as those recently passed in Georgia and Indiana.
- The 5 states that required photo ID in 2004 allowed voters who signed an affidavit or provided another form of identification to cast a regular ballot.

Voter ID Requirements

Reports from the voters

- CPS in November 2004 asked respondents about their experience voting.
- Stricter ID requirements exert a negative effect on whether survey respondents said they voted.
- Decline from Signing Name to Photo ID was 2.5%.
- Small negative effect persists when controlling for other variables, such as battleground state and demographics.

Effect of Stricter Voter ID requirements

Significant reduction in probability of voting by:

- Hispanic Voters (minus 9.7%)
- Voters below the poverty line
- Voters with less than a high-school education (-7.4%)
- Young voters (18-24)

No effect on the probability of voting by:

- African-American voters
- Voters with some college education

Trends in Litigation

Dan Tokaji

---

---

---

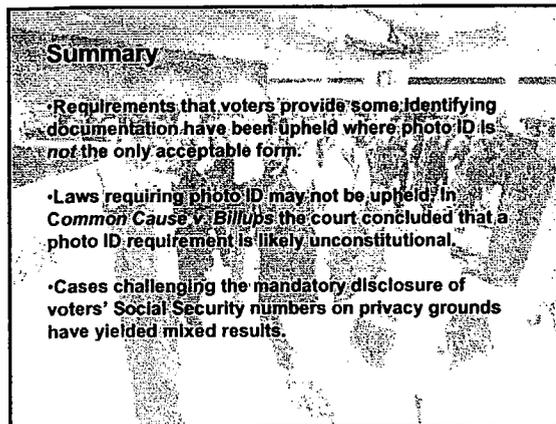

---

---

---

---

Summary

• Requirements that voters provide some identifying documentation have been upheld where photo ID is not the only acceptable form.

• Laws requiring photo ID may not be upheld. In Common Cause v. Billups the court concluded that a photo ID requirement is likely unconstitutional.

• Cases challenging the mandatory disclosure of voters' Social Security numbers on privacy grounds have yielded mixed results.

---

---

---

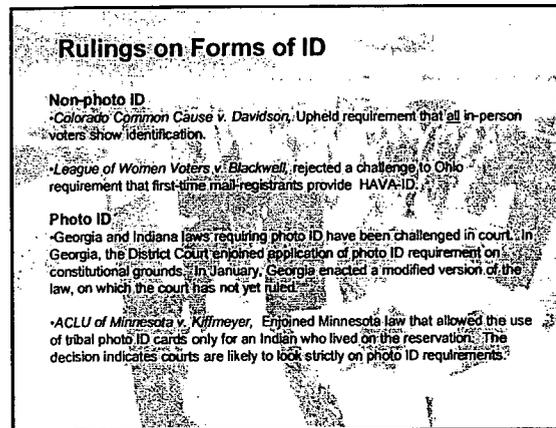

---

---

---

Rulings on Forms of ID

Non-photo ID

• Colorado Common Cause v. Davidson, Upheld requirement that all in-person voters show identification.

• League of Women Voters v. Blackwell, rejected a challenge to Ohio requirement that first-time mail-registrants provide HAVA-ID.

Photo ID

• Georgia and Indiana laws requiring photo ID have been challenged in court. In Georgia, the District Court enjoined application of photo ID requirement on constitutional grounds. In January, Georgia enacted a modified version of the law, on which the court has not yet ruled.

• ACLU of Minnesota v. Kilmeyer, Enjoined Minnesota law that allowed the use of tribal photo ID cards only for an Indian who lived on the reservation. The decision indicates courts are likely to look strictly on photo ID requirements.

---

---

---

---

---

Privacy

Greninger v. Davis, (4th Cir. 1993) struck down on due process grounds a Virginia requirement that voters provide Social Security numbers to register. Public disclosure of the social security numbers was not necessary to prevent fraud.

BUT McKay v. Thompson, (6th Cir. 2000) rejected privacy challenges based to a Tennessee law requiring Social Security numbers for voter registration.

NVRA permits requiring only the minimum information needed to prevent duplicate voter registration and determine eligibility. The distinction between the two cases appears to be between the use of Social Security numbers for internal purposes, which was deemed permissible, and the disclosure of those numbers to the public, which took place in Virginia.

---

---

---

---

---

Conclusions

Courts will look strictly at requirements that voters produce a photo ID in order to cast a regular ballot.

Courts will balance the legitimate interest in preventing election fraud against:

- Citizen's right to privacy
- Reasonableness of requirements for identify documents.

To forestall destabilizing challenges to election outcomes, voter ID requirements should be limited to the minimum needed to prevent duplicate registration and ensure eligibility.

Conclusions, Recommendations and Discussion

Tom O'Neill

---

---

---

---

---

---

---

Policy Perspective

If the ID requirements that block ineligible voters from the polls also prevent eligible voters from casting a ballot because they lack ID, the integrity of the ballot may not have been improved.

---

---

---

---

---

---

---

Policy Perspective Questions

- Are voter ID requirements based on valid studies of the incidence of the vote fraud they aim to prevent?
- Is the increase in ballot security promised by stricter ID requirements reasonably proportional to the costs measured in both monetary and other terms?
- Can all citizens comply with the requirements easily?
- If a requirement is likely to reduce turnout of eligible voters, what steps can or will be taken to ameliorate the adverse consequences?
- Do the requirements have a neutral result on the composition of the qualified electorate?

---

---

---

---

---

---

Continuing uncertainty

- Dynamics of Voter ID requirements, that is how they work in practice, are not well understood.
- Policy process should recognize this uncertainty - less certainty, more humility.
- Improve debate by additional research sponsored by the EAC.

---

---

---

---

---

---

Conclusions

More information is needed about:

- The kinds of vote fraud that could be prevented by more rigorous voter ID so that it is possible to evaluate tradeoffs between ballot access and ballot integrity.
- Why potential voters may be required to cast a provisional ballot?
- The ID-related reasons for rejecting provisional ballots during the 2006 and subsequent elections.
- The experience of voters in meeting ID requirements.

---

---

---

The EAC should :

A. Recommend the publication of a "Voting Impact Statement" by states considering changing their voter ID requirements. It would estimate the number and demographics of

1. Eligible potential voters that a proposed stricter ID requirement may keep away from the polls or be permitted to cast only a provisional ballot; and
2. Assess the number of ineligible voters who will be prevented from voting by stricter ID requirements.

---

---

---

---

---

---

The EAC should:

B. Encourage or require the states to:

1. Collect and report reliable, credible information on the relationship between ballot access and ballot security.
2. Survey provisional voters (anonymously) to determine why they were unable to cast a regular ballot.
3. Conduct pre-election polling to ask voters what they know about the voter ID requirements.

---

---

---

---

---

---

---

4. Examine the time period allowed for voters who cast a provisional ballot because they lacked required ID to return with their identification. Consider 3 factors:

- a. Convenience of voters;
- b. Total time allowed to evaluate ballots;
- c. Safe harbor provision in presidential elections.

Time period	Number of States	% PB Counted
< 1 week	14	35.4%
1 - 2 weeks	15	47.1%
> 2 weeks	14	60.8%

REPORT AND RECOMMENDATIONS TO THE EAC VOTER IDENTIFICATION ISSUES

1. Introduction and Report Background

This report to the United States Election Assistance Commission (EAC) presents recommendations for best practices to improve implementation of the requirements for voters to show identification pursuant to [statute or regulation citation]. It is based on research conducted by the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers, the State University of New Jersey, and the Moritz College of Law at Ohio State University under contract to the EAC, dated May 24, 2005. The research included a review and legal analysis of state statutes, regulations and litigation concerning voter identification and provisional voting, a sample survey of local election officials, and a statistical analysis of the effects of various requirements for voter identification on turnout in the 2004 election. This report is a companion to a report on Provisional Voting submitted to the EAC on November 28, 2005 under the same contract.

The Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA) (Public Law 107-252) authorizes the EAC (SEC. 241, 42 USC 15381) to conduct periodic studies of election administration issues. The purpose of these studies is to promote methods for voting and administering elections, including provisional voting, that are convenient, accessible and easy to use; that yield accurate, secure and expeditious voting systems; that afford each registered and eligible voter an equal opportunity to vote and to have that vote counted; and that are efficient.

2. Voter Identification –Background and Approach of the Study

Voters may have to identify themselves twice in the electoral process: when registering to vote and then when casting a ballot. The burden of providing required ID documents on the voter may be greater at the polls on Election Day than at the time of registration. The burden of checking ID, even as simple as a signature match, can be much greater on election workers at the polls than on those registering voters. Poll workers may be faced with long lines and limited time. This analysis focuses on ID requirements on Election Day, but with an appreciation that the ID requirements at time of registration and on Election Day are inter-related.<sup>1</sup> The emphasis here is on Voter ID on Election Day and afterwards as election judges evaluate provisional ballots. This is the critical period for the electoral system, the time when ballot access and ballot security are in the most sensitive balance.

FINAL D R A F T

This analysis takes a view of voter ID issues broader than the rather narrow identification requirements in HAVA. Much of the national ferment over voter ID goes beyond HAVA to require more rigorous documentation of identity for all would-be voters, not just those casting a ballot for the first time who had not registered in person. The controversy in the states over voter ID stems from the HAVA requirements, goes beyond those requirements, and sets the context for the analysis here.<sup>2</sup>

Identification is often described as the critical step in protecting the integrity of the ballot, the process that ensures that the potential voter is eligible and permitted to cast a ballot and one ballot only. In fact, ensuring ballot integrity requires a perspective that takes in the entire voting process. Protecting the integrity of the ballot requires more than preventing the ineligible from voting. It also should ensure that all those who are eligible and want to vote can cast a ballot that counts, and that they can effectively cast a ballot for the candidate of their choice. The protection effort must take into account all forms of voting, including absentee ballots, and embrace each step in the process. A voting system that establishes onerous requirements for voters to identify themselves may prevent the ineligible from voting, but it may also prevent the eligible from casting a ballot. If the ID requirements of a ballot protection system block ineligible voters from the polls at the cost of preventing eligible voters who cannot obtain or forget to bring to the polls the required forms of identification, the integrity of the ballot may not have been improved; the harm may be as great as the benefit.

Assessing the effectiveness of voter ID as a way to protect the integrity of the ballot should logically include an estimate of the nature and frequency of vote fraud. This analysis does not include consideration of the incidence of vote fraud, the forms that it takes, nor the possible effectiveness of various voter ID regimes to counter attempts at vote fraud. The EAC has commissioned a separate study of vote fraud and instructed us not to address that issue in this research.

<sup>2</sup> Harvard Law Review 119:1127. "Legislators hoping to stiffen their state antifraud laws have taken their cue from identification provisions buried in HAVA. . . . HAVA makes explicit that it shall not 'be construed to prevent a State from establishing election technology and administration requirements that are more strict than' HAVA itself provides. The states have accepted the invitation. "

Nonetheless, a broad view of ballot integrity is needed to appreciate the background and context of this narrower study. We explore the inter-relationships between Voter ID requirements and Provisional Voting and estimate the effects of various voter id requirements on turnout and on the casting of provisional ballots.

Voters lacking required ID, or who have ID that does not reflect their current address, may be able to vote only by casting a provisional ballot.<sup>3</sup> To the extent that stricter voter ID requirements divert more voters to the provisional ballot, voter ID requirements can put stress on the already pressured management of the polling place. Administering provisional ballots is more expensive than the normal ballot. Scrutiny of ID can create lines at the polling places, lines made longer as voters are diverted to the provisional voting line. Each of these potential consequences of more elaborate voter identification processes can increase the chance of litigation. Long lines will, at best, discourage voters and at worst make voting seem a hassle that will keep more citizens from the polls. A review of voter identification practices should keep in mind that America's problem may well be that too many people do not vote rather than that a few people may vote more than once.

An evaluation of the effect of different Voter ID regimes will be more effective if based on clear standards --legal, equitable, practical. The standards suggested here can best be described as the set of questions to be asked about Voter ID requirements. We suggest 7 questions that try to measure the most important dimensions of the problem.

- Is the Voter ID system designed on the basis of valid and reliable, empirical studies of the incidence of the sorts of vote fraud it is designed to prevent?
- How effective is the ID requirement in increasing the security of the ballot? How well can it be coordinated with a statewide voter database?<sup>4</sup>
- How practical is the requirement? Can it be administered smoothly by the staff and budget likely to be made available? How much additional training of polling place workers might be required? Is it simple enough or can it be defined with sufficient clarity

<sup>3</sup> For example, the Florida voter ID law adopted after the 2004 election and pre-cleared by the Department of Justice, permits voters who cannot meet the ID requirements to sign an affidavit on the envelope of a provisional ballot, which will be counted if the signature matches that on the voter's registration form.

that poll workers throughout the state can administer it uniformly and with a minimum of local interpretation made on the fly under the pressure of Election Day?<sup>5</sup>

- How cost-effective is the system? Does it increase the security of the ballot at an affordable cost, measured in both monetary and other costs? To improve understanding of the non-monetary component of the costs, conducting a voter impact study might be appropriate. The voter impact study would examine, before the adoption of the regulation, the cost of compliance by the voter (such as the cost in time and money of acquiring a photo ID card), any offsetting benefits to voters, and the possible disparate effects of the regulation on various groups of voters.
- If a side effect of the Voter ID regulation is likely to reduce turnout, generally or among particular groups, is it possible to take other steps to ameliorate the adverse consequences?<sup>6</sup>
- Does it comply with the letter and spirit of Voting Rights Act?
- The seventh question is more difficult to measure than those described in the 6 questions outlined above. The Voter ID requirements should have a neutral result on the composition of the qualified electorate. That is, those requirements should not be designed to reduce the turnout of particular groups of voters who may have a propensity to support one party over another. Whatever the requirement may be, all citizens should be able to comply with it easily and at no or minimal cost.

Summary of findings and conclusions

Voter turnout at the state level in 2004 declined where voter identification requirements were more demanding. While the trend is not perfectly linear, the data show a general movement toward lower turnout as requirements tend toward requiring greater levels of proof. An average of 63.1 percent of the voting age population turned out in states that required voters to state their names, compared to 57.3 percent in states that required photo identification. Including other factors beyond voter ID requirements diminishes the influence of voter ID on turnout. But the analysis still offers some support for the hypothesis that as the burden of voter identification requirements increases, turnout declines. The effect is particularly noticeable in counties with concentrations of Hispanic residents or of people living below the poverty line.

<sup>5</sup> In New York, in 2004, disparities in training and voting information were made all too apparent in a study finding elections officials had wildly varying interpretations of what the state's voter identification requirement was. Tova Wang, "Warning Bell in Ohio," December 5, 2005. Website, the Foundation for National Progress.

<sup>6</sup> For example, the Carter-Baker Commission accompanied its recommendation for a national voter ID card with a recommendations for an affirmative effort by the states to reach out and register the unregistered, to use the new Voter ID regime as a means to enroll more voters.

Evidence on the incidence of vote fraud, especially on the kind of vote fraud that could be reduced by requiring more rigorous voter identification is not sufficient to evaluate the tradeoffs between ensuring ballot access and ensuring ballot integrity. The lack of full understanding of the dynamics of voter ID requirements on political participation can be remedied by requiring the collection and reporting of data on the reasons potential voters are required to cast a provisional ballot and the reasons for rejecting provisional ballots. Also useful would be the results of exit polling of voters on their experiences in meeting voter ID requirements and on what type of ballot they cast.<sup>7</sup> And, of course, more information is needed on the incidence and varieties of vote fraud, but that inquiry is outside the scope of this report.

Recommendations for consideration and action by the EAC

The EAC should consider the following actions to improve understanding of the relationship between voter ID requirements, broadly defined, and the two important goals of ensuring ballot access and ensuring ballot integrity.

- Encourage or sponsor further research to clarify the connection between Voter ID requirements and the number of potential voters actually able to cast a ballot.
- Recommend as a best practice that before states adopt a change described as increasing ballot security, states should publish an analysis of the number of eligible, potential voters that the new requirement may keep away from the polls or be permitted to cast only a provisional ballot as well as an estimate of the number of ineligible voters who will be prevented from voting.
- Encourage or require the states in the 2006 election and beyond, to collect and report reliable, credible information on the relationship between ballot access and ballot security. The data should be analyzed to provide a sound estimate of the incidence of the kinds of vote fraud that more stringent ID requirements may prevent and should describe the dynamics of voter ID in preserving the security of the ballot?

<sup>7</sup> Arizona held its first election with new, stricter ID requirements on March 14, 2006. In at least one county (Maricopa) election officials handed a survey to voters that asked if they knew about the voter identification law and if they did, how they found out about it. Edythe Jensen, "New Voter ID Law Goes Smoothly in Chandler," Arizona Republic, March 15, 2006. More surveys of this kind can illuminate the dynamics of voter ID and voting in ways not possible with the current lack of information on this subject.

FINAL D R A F T

- Useful information could be supplied by exit polling. It would identify those who had cast a provisional ballot and ask why they were unable to cast a regular ballot. Answers would illuminate the frequency with which ID issues divert voters into the provisional ballot line.
- Polling to ask voters what they know about the voter id requirements would also provide useful context for evaluating the effect of various voter id requirements on electoral participation.
- Encourage states to examine the time period allowed for voters who cast a provisional ballot because they lacked required ID to return with their identification. In eleven states, voters who had to cast a provisional ballot because they lacked the ID required for a regular ballot were permitted to return later with their ID. Their provision of this ID is the critical step in evaluating the ballots. The length of the period in which the voter may return with ID is important. In setting the time period for return, which now varies among the states from the same day to about two weeks, states should consider three criteria: the convenience of the voter, the total time allowed to evaluate ballots<sup>8</sup>, and the safe harbor provision in presidential elections.

<sup>8</sup> Our research on provisional voting reveals that states that provide more than week to evaluate provisional ballots end up counting substantially more of those ballots than states that provide less than a week.

3. Voter ID and Turnout

As of the 2004 election, the states and the District of Columbia could be divided into 5 different Voter ID regimes. These are shown in Table 1, Voter ID Requirements. Nine states required that voters give their names; 14 that they sign their names; 8 match the signature to a sample in the registration book; 15 require some form of ID (ranging from a utility bill to a government-issued photo ID), and 5 states in 2004 required a photo ID, although in all those states voters without that credential could cast a regular ballot after signing an affidavit concerning their identity and eligibility.

^In Florida and Louisiana, states that required a photo id in 2004, voters without that credential could sign an affidavit concerning their identity and eligibility and cast a regular ballot.

^^In these states in 2004, voters lacking a photo ID could vote by providing other ID.

*Arizona voters who lack a photo ID may present 2 forms of ID with no photograph, such as 2 utility bills.

**State only requires ID for first-time voters who register by mail without providing ID. They accept all forms of ID listed in the statute.

***Georgia is currently enjoined from implementing this law, returning them for the time being to their 2004 requirement of provide ID.

****Pennsylvania requires ID of all first-time voters, whether they registered by mail or in-person.

*****Tennessee voters must provide signature and address. In counties without computerized lists, the signature is compare to the registration card. In counties with computerized lists, the signature is compared to a signature on ID presented with registration.

*****Texas voters must present a current registration certificate. Those without a certificate can vote provisionally after completing an affidavit.

In 9 states, voters were required merely to state their names so that poll workers could locate them in the registration book. In 14 states, voters signed their names. In 8 states, voters' signatures were matched with a specimen signature. In 15 states voters had to show some form of ID, not necessarily an official picture ID. And in 5 states, voters were required to show an official photo ID, although in 2004 voters who lacked a picture ID could execute an affidavit and vote a regular ballot.

This neat assignment of each state to one of a few categories may fail to reflect actual practice at a polling place. Like any system run by fallible people it is subject to wide variation in practice. Voters may be confronted with demands for identification at variance with state statutes or legislation. Other voters may be waved through the process without a look at any document, no matter what the regulations may say. Under the press of long lines and unfamiliar requirements, there is, in short, no sure way to report the wide variety of conditions voters may encounter.

It is not practical to attempt to capture the wide variety of how voter ID requirements may be actually implemented across the nation's tens of thousands of polling places. Recognizing that means that the analysis of the effect of state requirements on county-level turnout must be viewed with some caution.

Effect of Voter ID requirements on Turnout

Summary of Findings and Conclusions

We categorized each state according to its voter ID requirements in 2004, as shown in Table 1 and analyzed turnout data for each county according to the voter identification requirements of its state. We also assessed self-reported turnout by the sample interviewed in the November 2004 Current Population Survey of the Census Bureau.<sup>9</sup>

Voter turnout at the state level in 2004 varied based on voter identification requirements. An average of 63.1 percent of the voting age population turned out in states that required voters to state their names, compared to 57.3 percent in states that required photo identification. Other factors, of course, also influence turnout. Taking those other factors into account in the county-level analysis makes the effect of the voter ID requirement less dramatic. But the analysis still offers some support for the hypothesis that as the burden of voter identification requirements increases, turnout declines. The effect is particularly noticeable in counties with concentrations of Hispanic residents or of people living below the poverty line.

The individual-level analysis, based on the CPS, produced a similar result. Voter identification requirements exert a statistically significant, negative effect on whether survey respondents said they had voted in 2004. The probability that a respondent to the survey voted dropped with each level of voter identification requirement, with a total drop of 2.5 percent across the five types of identification.

Future policy decisions should consider the tradeoffs between the incidence of vote fraud that can be prevented by stricter voter ID requirements and the number of eligible voters who will be kept from the polls by those stricter ID requirements. Continuing research is needed to provide the information to inform this calculation of benefits and costs.

Methods and Findings

We classified each state as having one of five types of identification requirements in place on Election Day 2004. Upon arrival at polling places, voters had to either: state their names (9 states); sign their names (13 states and the District of Columbia); match their signature to a signature on file with the local election board (8 states); provide a form of identification that did not necessarily include a photo (15 states); or provide a photo identification (5 states). We then tested the assumption that voter identification requirements would prove to be increasingly demanding on the voter, with providing photo ID the most rigorous, a form of identification, and providing a form of photo identification.

The analysis recognized that election laws in numerous states offer exceptions to these requirements if a prospective voter lacked the ID. Laws in those states set a minimum standard that a voter must meet in order to vote using a regular ballot. We therefore also categorized states based on the minimum requirement for voting with a regular ballot. None of the states required photo identification as a minimum standard for voting with a regular ballot. Four states, however, required voters to swear an affidavit as to their identity (Florida, Indiana, Louisiana, and North Dakota). The five categories for minimum requirements were: state name (12 states), sign name (14 states and the District of Columbia), match one's signature to a signature on file (six states), provide a non-photo identification (14 states), or swear an affidavit (four states). This analysis treats the array of minimum identification requirements also in terms of increasing demand on the voter: state name, sign name, match signature, provide non-photo identification, and, given the potential legal consequences for providing false information, swearing an affidavit.

Voter turnout at the state level in 2004 declined as voter identification requirements became more demanding, as shown in Table 2. While the trend is not perfectly linear, there is a general movement toward lower turnout as requirements tend toward requiring greater levels of proof. Using the maximum requirements as the independent variable, an average of 63.1 percent of the voting age population turned out in states that required voters to state their names, compared to 57.3 percent in states that required photo identification. A similar trend emerged when using the minimum requirements as the independent variable. Sixty-one percent of the voting age population turned out in states requiring voters to state their names, compared to 58.7 percent in states that required an affidavit from voters.

Voter identification requirements alone do not determine voter turnout. Other influences – demographic or political-- also affect voter participation. Multivariate models that take into account other predictors and place the effects of voter identification in a more accurate context. To consider that broader context, our multivariate analysis included whether the county was in a presidential battleground state or a state with a competitive race for governor or the U.S. Senate. Demographic variables included the percentage of the voting-age population in each county that was Hispanic or African-American, the percentage of county residents age 65 and older, and the percentage of the county population living below the poverty line. The dependent variable in each model was voter turnout at the county level, with turnout calculated as the percentage of the voting-age population that voted in the 2004 election.

The aggregate analysis for the maximum identification requirements revealed a small and negative effect on turnout in 2004 controlling for electoral context and demographic factors. If the state was a battleground for president, governor or senate voter turnout increased. As the percentage of senior citizens in the county increased, so did turnout. The percentage of African-

Americans in the county had no effect, but the percentage of Hispanic adults reduced voter turnout, as did the percentage of individuals living below the poverty line.

In general, analysis of the aggregate data at the county level provides some support for the hypothesis that as the burden of voter identification requirements increases, turnout declines, at least in the case of the maximum requirements. This is particularly so for counties with concentrations of Hispanic residents or individuals who live below the poverty line.

Information collected for the Census Bureau Current Population Survey in November 2004 makes it possible to examine the influence of voter ID requirements at the individual level. Self-identified registered voters reported their experience at the polls in the survey. (Note that the voter turnout rate for the CPS sample, an average of 89%, is much higher than the turnout rates presented in the aggregate data analysis, which average 58%. The difference is a result of several factors, including different denominators in calculating the turnout rate – self-reported registered voters in the CPS versus the much larger voting-age population for the aggregate data. Also some survey respondents overstate their incidence of voting.) Nevertheless, the CPS serves as a widely accepted source of data on voting behavior.

The dependent variable in the individual analyses is whether respondents said they voted in the 2004 election. As in the aggregate analysis the contextual variables consist of whether the state was a battleground state or had competitive state-level races. The analysis also controlled for gender, age in years, education, household income, race or ethnicity, and employment status, marital status, and residential mobility.

The analysis revealed that voter identification requirements exerted a statistically significant, negative effect on whether survey respondents said they had voted in 2004. Of the other state factors, only the competitiveness of the presidential race had a significant effect on turnout. In terms of demographic influences, consistent with previous research, age, education, income, and marital status all were positive predictors of voting. Women also were more likely to say they voted than men. Those who had moved within six months before the interview were less likely to say they had voted.

Allowing the voter identification requirement to vary while holding constant all other variables in the model showed that the predicted probability of turnout ranged from 91.2 percent if all voters had to state their names to 88.7 percent if all voters had to provide photo identification. (Note that these turnout figures are higher than actual because of the factors involved in the CPS's self-reported survey, but that the difference in effect is reasonably related to the results obtained in the aggregate analysis.) In other words, the probability of voting dropped with each level of the maximum voter identification requirement, with a total drop of 2.5 percent across the five types of identification. When taking into account the minimum requirement for identification, the probability showed a similar decline, with a slightly larger total drop of 3.3 percent.

Both the maximum and minimum identification requirements had negative and statistically significant effects for white voters. Allowing the requirements to vary from stating one's name to providing photo identification or an affidavit showed drops of 2.5 percent and 3.3 percent respectively in the predicted probability of voting. The identification requirements had no effect on the probability of African-Americans voting, but the minimum identification requirements had a comparatively sizable effect on voter turnout among Hispanics. The predicted probability of Hispanics voting ranged from 87 percent if stating one's name would be the required form of identification to 77.3 percent if a voter would have to provide an affidavit in order to vote, a difference of 9.7 percent. Variation also emerged along the lines of income, with the effects of voter identification requirements varying to a greater extent for voters in households below the poverty line compared to those living above the poverty line.

Registered voters who had less than a high school education had a 77.5 percent probability of voting if the maximum requirement would be stating one's name, and a 70.8 percent probability if they would have to provide photo identification under the maximum requirement, a difference of 6.7 percent. The range of effects of voter identification requirements was smaller among those with higher levels of education (and non-existent for one category – voters with some college education).

Discussion and Conclusions of the Analysis

The results presented here give evidence that tougher voter identification requirements are associated with a decline in voter participation. The overall effect for all registered voters was fairly small, but even a slight decline in turnout has the potential to alter the outcome of a close election. The decline is apparent in both the aggregate data and the individual-level data, although not always for both the maximum and minimum sets of requirements.

FINAL D R A F T

- Hispanic voters and the poor appear to be less likely to vote if the level of required identification becomes more demanding, according to both the aggregate and the individual-level data. In the individual-level data, for Hispanic voters, the probability of voting dropped by 9.7 percent across the various levels of minimum identification requirements. Survey respondents living in poor households would be 5.3 percent less likely to vote as the requirements vary from stating one's name to attesting to one's identity in an affidavit.
- Self-reported registered voters who had not graduated from high school would be 6.7 percent less likely to vote if the maximum requirement is photo identification as opposed to stating one's name. When considering the minimum requirements, those with less than a high school education would be 7.4 percent less likely to say they voted if the requirement was an affidavit as opposed to stating one's name.
- Age was also a key factor, with voters ages 18 to 24 being 7.7 percent to 8.9 percent less likely to vote as the requirements ranged from stating one's name to providing a photo identification or affidavit.
- Two concerns aired by critics of voter identification requirements were not borne out by the results. African-American voters did not appear to be affected by voter identification requirements, according to both the aggregate data and individual-level data analyses. Also, the elderly, while they would be slightly less likely to vote as requirements range from least to most demanding, would not necessarily be affected in the dramatic manner predicted by some opposed to photo identification requirements in particular.

The data examined in this analysis could not capture the dynamics of how identification requirements might lower turnout. Do these requirements dampen turnout because individuals are aware of the requirements and stay away from the polls because they cannot or do not want to meet the requirements? Or, do the requirements result in some voters being turned away when they cannot meet the requirements on Election Day? The CPS data do not include measures that can answer these questions, pointing up the need for collection of additional data. Knowing more about the "on the ground" experiences of voters concerning identification requirements could guide policy-makers at the state and local level in determining whether and at what point in the electoral cycle a concerted public information campaign might be most effective in helping voters to meet identification requirements. Such knowledge also could help in designing training for poll workers to handle questions about, and potential disputes over, voter identification requirements.

4. Litigation over Voter ID Requirements

There have been a handful of cases challenging identification requirements in court in recent years. In general, requirements that voters provide some identifying documentation have been upheld, where photo ID is not the only acceptable form. Whether or not laws requiring photo ID will be upheld is more doubtful. To date, only one court has considered a law requiring voters to show photo ID (Common Cause v. Billups), and that court concluded that this requirement is likely unconstitutional. Cases challenging the mandatory disclosure of voters' Social Security numbers on privacy grounds have yielded mixed results.

Non-photo identification. For the most part, courts have looked favorably on cases challenging requirements that voters present some form of identifying documents if the photo identification is the only form accepted. In Colorado Common Cause v. Davidson, No. 04CV7709, 2004 WL 2360485, at *1 (Colo. Dist. Ct. Oct. 18, 2004), plaintiffs challenged a law requiring all in-person voters to show identification (not just first-time registrants). The court upheld this requirement against a constitutional challenge. Similarly, in League of Women Voters v. Blackwell, 340 F. Supp. 2d 823 (N.D. Ohio 2004), the court rejected a challenge to an Ohio directive requiring first-time voters who registered by mail to provide one of the HAVA-permitted forms of identification, in order to have their provisional ballots counted. Specifically, the directive provided that their provisional ballots would be counted if the voter (a) orally recited his driver's license number or the last four digits of his social security number or (b) returned to the polling place before it closed with some acceptable identification (including reciting those identification numbers). Id. This was found to be consistent with HAVA.

Photo ID. Since the 2004 election, two states have adopted laws requiring photo identification in order to have one's vote counted, without an affidavit exception: Georgia and Indiana. Both these requirements were enacted in 2005 and both have been challenged in court. The Georgia law required voters attempting to cast a ballot in person present a valid form of photographic identification. O.C.G.A. § 21-2-417. On October 18, 2005, the District Court granted the Plaintiff's motion for a preliminary injunction, enjoining the application of the new identification requirements on constitutional grounds. In granting the injunction, the court held that plaintiffs' claims under both the Fourteenth Amendment (equal protection) and Twenty-Fourth Amendment (poll tax) had a substantial likelihood of succeeding on the merits at trial (Common Cause v. Billups, Prelim. Inj. 96, 104). In January 2006, Georgia enacted a modified version of its photo ID law, which the court has not yet ruled on. In the other state that has enacted a photo ID requirement without an affidavit exception (Indiana), legal challenges have also been filed. (Indiana Democratic Party v. Rokita and Crawford v. Marion County Election Board). Cross-motions for summary judgment are currently pending. Another case of significance, for purposes of photo ID requirements, is American Civil Liberties Union of Minnesota v. Kiffmeyer, No. 04-CV-4653, 2004 WL 2428690, at *1 (D. Minn. Oct. 28, 2004). In that case, the court enjoined a Minnesota law that allowed the use of tribal photo ID cards, only for an Indian who lived on the reservation. 2004 WL 2428690, at *1. The Court found no rational basis for distinguishing based on whether or not the cardholder lives on the reservation. Id. at *1, 3. The court's decision in this case indicates that courts are likely to look strictly on photo ID requirements.

FINAL D R A F T

Privacy. In Greidinger v. Davis, 988 F.2d 1344 (4th Cir. 1993), the court struck down on due process grounds a Virginia law requiring disclosure of voters' social security numbers for voter registration. The social security numbers recorded in voter registration lists had been disclosed to the public and political parties that had requested the lists. The court found that the requirement to give the social security number effectively conditioned rights on the consent to an invasion of privacy. It concluded that this public disclosure of the social security numbers was not necessary to achieve the government's interest in preventing fraud. On the other hand, in McKay v. Thompson, 226 F.3d 752 (6th Cir. 2000), the court rejected privacy challenges based on both the Constitution and federal statutes, to a Tennessee law requiring social security numbers for voter registration since 1972. 226 F.3d at 755. Second, the NVRA only permits requiring the minimum amount of information necessary to prevent duplicate voter registration and to determine eligibility. The distinction appears to be between the use of Social Security numbers for internal purposes only, which was deemed permissible, and the disclosure of those numbers to the public which was not.

These decisions suggest that the courts will look strictly at requirements that voters produce a photo ID in order to cast a regular ballot. The courts have used a balancing test to weigh the legitimate interest in preventing election fraud against the citizen's right to privacy (protecting social security numbers from public disclosure, for example) and the reasonableness of requirements for identity documents. To provide both the clarity and certainty in administration of elections needed to forestall destabilizing challenges to outcomes, these early decisions suggest that best practice may be to conform to the NVRA's limitation on requirements for voter identification to the minimum needed to prevent duplicate registration and ensure eligibility.

5. Developments since 2004

Since the passage of HAVA, with its limited requirements for voter identification, and following the 2004 election, debate over voter ID has taken place in state legislatures across the country. That debate has not been characterized by solid information on the consequences of tightening requirements for voters to identify themselves before being permitted to cast a regular, rather than a provisional, ballot.

Better information might improve the quality of the debate. Answers to the following key questions are not available in a form that might satisfy those on both sides of the argument.

- What is the overall incidence of vote fraud?
- How does fraud take place in the various stage of the process: registration, voting at the polls, absentee voting, or ballot counting?
- What contribution can tighter requirements for voter ID make to reducing vote fraud?
- What would be the other consequences of increasingly demanding requirements for voters to identify themselves? This is the question addressed, within the limits of the available data, in the analysis in this report.

This information would allow a more informed judgment to be brought to bear in the states as they consider the tradeoffs among the competing goals of ballot integrity, ballot access, and administrative efficiency. The Carter-Baker Commission recognized the tradeoffs when it tied recommendation for national ID to an affirmative effort by government to identify unregistered voters and make it easy for them to register.

State Voter Databases and Voter ID

With the implementation of the HAVA Computerized Statewide Voter Registration List, an application for voter registration for an election for Federal office may not be accepted or processed unless the application includes a driver's license number or last four digits of the Social Security number on the voter registration form. This information can be used to verify the identity of the registrant through interfacing with lists maintained by the Motor Vehicle office and Social Security office. If registrants do not have either a driver's license or Social Security number, the State will assign a unique identifier number to that person.

HAVA does not require that the states notify registrants to remedy any failure to provide either of these numbers or to confirm that they have provided a verifiable number. Verification at the time of registration could forestall difficulties at the polling place. HAVA is silent on how the ID might be required at the polling place for new voters whose driving license or Social Security number could not be verified. Errors in recording those numbers are sure to occur.

Some states are wrestling now with these unresolved issues. In New Jersey, for example, pending legislation require that voters must be able to confirm their registration through a secure access to the SVRL. It also requires voters to present ID at the polls in order to cast a regular ballot if the numbers recorded on the registration have not been verified (or if no verifiable number appears on the registration). It recognizes the HAVA requirement that if the number provided by the voter has not been verified and if the voter does not present ID at the polls, that voter may cast a provisional ballot. The bill does not specify they have to provide ID within 48 hours in order for their vote to count, as is the case with first-time mail-in registrants.

As some states gain experience in this area, the EAC would perform a useful service by making timely recommendations of best practices for all states to consider.

6. Conclusions

The form of Voter ID required of voters affects turnout. Lack of ID can keep voters from the polls. Or, when they go to the polls, it is reasonable to conclude that stricter Voter ID requirements will divert more voters into the line for provisional ballots. (This conclusion is a conjecture because we lack good data on why voters must cast their ballots provisionally.) The result can be longer lines at the polls and confusion, without a clear demonstration that the security of the ballot is correspondingly increased.<sup>10</sup> The dynamics of Voter ID requirements – how the more rigorous Voter ID requirements—affect the decision by potential voters to go or stay away from the polls are not well understood. This lack of understanding should be recognized in the policy process. The debate over voter ID in the states would be improved by additional research sponsored by the EAC. That research might address that, so far as may be necessary to reduce vote fraud, could identify methods to eliminate the need for voters to bring specific identity documents with them to the polls while assuring that each voter who casts a ballot is eligible and votes only once. One way to break the connection between the benefits of photo ID and the need for the voter to bring identification to the polling place, as recommended by our colleague Edward Foley: keep the information to verify a voter's identity in the records at the polling place. Other approaches could be developed.<sup>11</sup>

<sup>10</sup> In this connection, the Brennan Center's response to the Carter-Baker Commission report observes that, "while it might be true that in a close election "a small amount of fraud could make the margin of difference," it is equally true that the rejection of a much larger number of eligible voters could make a much bigger difference in the outcome." The exclusion of voters through restrictive ID requirements could affect election outcomes as much as fraud by voters at the polls. Response to the Report of the 2005 Commission on Federal Election Reform, The Brennan Center for Justice at NYU School of Law and Spencer Overton, On Behalf Of The National Network on State Election Reform, September 19, 2005

<sup>11</sup> "A potential solution to this problem is to break the connection with the photo requirement and the obligation to produce identification at the polls. Eligible citizens could be required to provide a photograph at the time they register to vote, and poll workers would match this photograph with the image of the person standing in front of them. Given the availability of digital photography, the photos of registered voters could be stored in electronic poll books and easily "pulled up" with a click of a computer mouse when voters sign in to vote. These electronic photos should satisfy the anti-fraud concerns of conservatives as much as printed photos that citizens would be required to bring to the polls. . . . Of course, to satisfy the concerns of liberals, a requirement to provide a digital photograph at time of registration would have to address the cost and accessibility issues identified earlier. "

Court Decisions

Summary of Relevant Cases:

Challenges Prevailed:

American Civil Liberties Union of Minnesota v. Kiffmeyer, 2004

- Action for temporary restraining order – granted
- Statute: allowed use of tribal identification cards w/ name, address & photo as a valid identification to register to vote only if the voter lives on the reservation to “complete” a mail-in application (which only affected about 600 voters w/ incomplete applications)
- Claim -14th Amendment EPC: likely to prevail, no rational basis for a distinction between Indians residing on reservations and those not
- Statute: may use certain forms of photo identification lacking address together with a utility bill but not tribal identification cards
- Claim -14th Amendment EPC: likely to prevail

Greidinger v. Davis, 1993

- Statute: mandated disclosure of SS # as a precondition to voter registration (rationale was voter identification, but the numbers were rarely used to verify identity & were disclosed in voter lists to both political parties and the public upon request)
- Claims:
  - 14th Amendment EPC: no classification (applied strict scrutiny)
  - Substantive due process: law invalid; found that the statute conditioned the fundamental right to vote on the consent to an invasion of privacy; this was found to be a substantial burden (applied strict scrutiny)
    - Compelling interests: preventing voter fraud (deemed compelling)
    - Necessary: fails, preventing voter fraud when allowing names for inspection could be achieved by supplying addresses and DOBs or use of voter registration numbers
    - HOWEVER: Court also made it clear that if the registration scheme kept the SS# for internal use only – it would be valid

Challenges Rejected:

League of Women Voters v. Blackwell, 2004.

- Sec. of State Directive: provisional ballots issued if first-time voter, who registered by mail and did not provide ID, cannot produce proper ID at the polls AND that the provisional ballot will only be counted if the voter returns to the poll before it closes w/ ID or can recite SS# or DL#
- Claims – Supremacy Clause & HAVA: ruled that HAVA did not specify how the first-time voters' identifications should be verified and this method was not unreasonable or too burdensome

Colorado Common Clause v. Davidson, 2004

- Statute: required all voters to show ID (most types permitted) before voting
- Claims:
  - HAVA: ruled that HAVA did not preempt more strict state laws & allowed States to be more strict as long as consistent with the purpose of HAVA (both HAVA & CO provisions' purposes were to prevent voter fraud)
  - Substantive due process and equal protection
    - No improper discrimination

006396

FINAL D R A F T

- Preventing voter fraud is a compelling interest since it is irreversible once vote is cast
- Only marginally more intrusive than HAVA, many types of identification permitted – thus, valid

McKay v. Thompson, 2000

- Statute: mandated disclosure of SS # as a precondition to voter registration
- Claims:
  - Privacy Act, Section 7: ruled that Tennessee voter system exempt from Privacy Act because it is pre-75
  - NVRA, permitting only min. amt. of info. necessary to prevent duplicate registration and determine eligibility: ruled that NVRA does not specifically forbid the use of SS#s & the Privacy Act specifically permits them pre-75
  - Substantive due process: ruled that internal use of SS# not a burden
  - Free Exercise, based on Bible's supposed prohibition on use of universal identifiers: ruled that law is generally applicable and thus valid
  - P&I, Article IV: does not protect in-state citizens
  - P&I, 14th Amend.: no protection for privilege where Congress authorized its infringement

Kemp v. Tucker, 1975

- Statute: required name, occupation, address, sex, race, height, hair color, eye color, and date of birth be listed on voter registration card for identification purposes
- Claims:
  - VRA: ruled that race was not made a "qualification" for voting
  - 15th Amendment: ruled that it did not abridge right to vote on account of race because rejection of application was due to failure to provide information, not race; race only one factor in identification
  - 14th Amendment EPC: ruled there was no distinction among voters

Perez v. Riddlehoover, 1966

- Statute: date of birth, place of birth, mother's first or maiden name, color of eyes, sex, race, occupation, and whether owner, tenant or boarder must appear on the registration for identification
- Claims:
  - VRA: ruled that it was not a "test or device" because it applied equally
  - 15th Amendment: same reasons

Cases in Which the Plaintiffs Have Prevailed in Challenging the Statute Requiring Voter Identification:

American Civil Liberties Union of Minnesota v. Kiffmeyer, No. 04-CV-4653, 2004 WL 2428690, at *1 (D. Minn. Oct. 28, 2004).

This was an action just before the November 2004 election for a temporary restraining order, which was granted. The ACLU challenged a Minnesota law allowing the use of tribal identification cards with the name, address, and photograph as a valid identification (equal to a driver's license) for use in "completing" an incomplete mail-in voter registration only if the Indian lives on the reservation. 2004 WL 2428690, at *1. The Court ruled that this distinction would likely violate the Equal Protection Clause because there was no rational basis for differentiating between the validity of the identification based on whether or not the cardholder lives on the reservation. Id. at *1, 3.

Secondly, the ACLU challenged a second statute which allowed the use of certain photo identification lacking the voter's address to be used together with a utility bill or bank statement as valid identification for registration. Id. at *3. The statute did not, however, permit using a tribal identification for this same purpose. Id. The Court ruled that this likely violated the equal protection clause as well. Id.

Greidinger v. Davis*, 988 F.2d 1344 (4th Cir. 1993).

This case challenged a Virginia law requiring the social security number for voter registration, which the State subsequently disclosed to the public and political parties upon request in voter registration lists, which included the social security numbers. Failure to provide the social security number resulted in the denial of the registration application. The law was challenged under the Equal Protection Clause and under substantive due process. The Court quickly rejected the equal protection challenge because the law made no classification. 988 F.2d at 1350.

The law was invalidated under substantive due process. Id. at 1355. The Court found that the statutory scheme conditioned the fundamental right to vote on the consent to an invasion of privacy, based on concerns of identity theft. Id. at 1353-54. The Court found this to be a substantial burden on the right to vote. Id. at 1354. The Court recognized that the government's interest in preventing voter fraud was compelling. Id. However, the Court found that disclosure of the information to the public and political parties was not necessary to achieve that interest. Id. Disclosure of addresses or dates of birth would be sufficient to aid the public in distinguishing between two voters with the same name. Id. at 1355. The Court did state that required disclosure of the social security number for internal use only would be valid. Id. at 1354 n.10.

Cases in Which the Statute or Practice of Voter Identification Has Been Upheld:

League of Women Voters v. Blackwell*, 340 F. Supp. 2d 823 (N.D. Ohio 2004).

The League of Women Voters challenged the Secretary of State's directive that provisional ballots should be issued to all first-time voters who registered by mail without providing identification who cannot show proper identification at the polls. 340 F. Supp. 2d at 828. The Directive also stated that the provisional ballots would only be counted if the voter orally recited his driver's license number or the last four digits of his social security number or returned to the polling place before it closed with some acceptable identification, including reciting those identification numbers. Id. The Court stated that HAVA only requires verification of eligibility of first time voters registering by mail; it does not say how that should be done. Id. at 831. The Court found the burden on the right to vote to be slight. Id. The Directive was found valid under HAVA and the Supremacy Clause because the number of uncounted votes would be small, the requirement was reasonable, and there was adequate notice of the requirement on the registration forms. Id. at 829-30.

Colorado Common Cause v. Davidson*, No. 04CV7709, 2004 WL 2360485, at *1 (Colo. Dist. Ct. Oct. 18, 2004).

In this case, the validity of three Colorado statutory provisions was challenged. The laws (1) required all in-person voters to show identification (not just first-time registrants); (2) provided that votes cast in the wrong precinct would not be counted; and (3) provided that provisional ballots would not be counted if the voter applied for an absentee ballot. 2004 WL 2360485, at *1. The plaintiffs also challenged the provisions under HAVA. The identification provision allowed nearly all forms of acceptable identification under HAVA. Id. at *6.

The challenge to the identification requirement failed under both challenges. The Court interpreted HAVA as not intended to preempt state laws and as permitting states to be more strict than, but not inconsistent with, HAVA. Id. at *10. The Court felt that the purpose of both laws was the same, to reduce voter fraud, and thus, both laws could coexist. As to the Constitutional claim, both equal protection and substantive due process, the Court felt that preventing voter fraud, which is impossible to remedy once a vote is cast, is a compelling interest, and the Court also felt that a voter identification requirement for all voters, with many types of acceptable identification, was only marginally more intrusive than HAVA. Id. at 12. The Court also found no improper discrimination between voters. Id. Thus, the provision was upheld.

McKay v. Thompson*, 226 F.3d 752 (6th Cir. 2000).

The Sixth Circuit ruled that the Privacy Act, the National Voter Registration Act, Substantive Due Process, the Privileges and Immunities Clauses (Fourteenth Amendment & Article IV), and the First Amendment right to free exercise do not prohibit requiring disclosure of social security numbers as a precondition to voter registration.

The Privacy Act, Section 7, mandates that it is unlawful for a government to deny a right or privilege because of a citizen's refusal to disclose his social security number, unless the disclosure was required for a system established prior to 1975. 226 F.3d at 755 (citing Privacy Act of 1974, Pub. L. No. 93-579 (1974)). Since Tennessee required social security numbers for voter registration since 1972, his challenge was rejected. 226 F.3d at 755. Second, the NVRA only permits requiring the minimum amount of information necessary to prevent duplicate voter registration and to determine eligibility. Id. at 755-56 (citing 42 U.S.C. §1973gg-3(c)(2)(B)). The Court rejected this challenge because the NVRA does not specifically forbid the use of social security numbers, and the Privacy Act, a more specific statute, grandfathered their use if prior to 1975. 226 F.3d at 756.

Finally, the plaintiff's constitutional claims were all rejected. His substantive due process claim was rejected because internal receipt and use of social security numbers does not burden the fundamental right to vote. Id. The free exercise challenge, based on the Bible's supposed prohibition of universal identifiers, was rejected because the law was generally applicable and not directed at particular religious practices. Id. The Privileges and Immunities Clause claim was rejected because the Clause does not apply to citizens of the state. Id. The Fourteenth Amendment Privileges and Immunities claim, based on the right to vote as unique to U.S. citizenship, was rejected because the Clause provides no protection where Congress has authorized the infringement. Id.

Kemp v. Tucker*, 396 F. Supp. 737 (M.D. Pa. 1975), aff'd, 423 U.S. 803.

A statute was upheld, which required name, occupation, address, sex, race, height, hair color, eye color, and date of birth to be recorded on the voter registration card and allowed registration officials to reject an incomplete application. 396 F. Supp. at 738. Claims were alleged under the Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause, the Fifteenth Amendment, and the Voting Rights Act.

As to the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendment claims, the Court reasoned that preventing voter fraud is a compelling goal, and identification provisions are "an essential means of achieving the goal." Id. at 739. The Court also rejected the equal protection claim because the statutes did not create a distinction at all. Id. at 740 n.3. Since race is just one of several characteristics required, the Court found that it was intended for preventing voter fraud, not some other motive. Id. at 740. As to the VRA, the Court rejected the claim that it added race as a qualification for voting as frivolous. Id. As to a Fifteenth Amendment claim that it abridged the right to vote on account of race, the Court also made a distinction between rejecting a voter application because of race and rejecting an application because of failure to answer all relevant questions to assist in preventing voter fraud. Id. The statute was upheld.

Perez v. Rhiddlehoover*, 186 So. 2d 686 (La. Ct. App. 1966).

A voter registration requirement was challenged and upheld. The statute stated that date of birth, place of birth, mother's first or maiden name, color of eyes, sex, race, occupation, and whether owner, tenant or boarder must appear on the registration. 186 So.2d at 690. This information was required for identification of voters, especially when voters had the same name, to prevent duplicate voting. It was challenged under the Voting Rights Act of 1965 Section 4(a) which prohibits denying the right to vote for failure to comply with a "test or device." The Court felt that this requirement was not a test or device for discrimination because it applied equally. Id. at 691. The Court also determined that it was not in conflict with the Fifteenth Amendment either. Id.

Friendly House, et al. v. Janet Napolitano et al.*, CV 04-649 TUC DCB

On November 30, 2004, the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund (MALDEF) filed suit seeking to halt the implementation of Proposition 200. . Proposition 200 created a number of legal requirements to ensure that public benefits are not available to illegal immigrants. In particular, Proposition 200 requires that a person attempting to register to vote provide one of six specific forms of proof of United States citizenship. Compl. 12-13. Also, any person attempting to vote must present either one form of photo identification or two forms of non-photo identification. Id. at 13.

The lawsuit alleges two violations that directly relate to the voting identification restrictions. First, the lawsuit alleges a violation of the Twenty-Fourth and Fourteenth amendments in that a voter must pay a poll tax by spending money to purchase the required identification. Id. at 20. Second, the lawsuit alleges violation of the Voting Rights Act. Id. at 21. The lawsuit was recently dismissed by the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals for a lack of standing. The Circuit Court found that there was no injury-in-fact, meaning that once an injury occurs the suit will likely be refiled. Additionally, it should be noted that the voter identification issue is only a part of the lawsuit, and much of the focus has been on other aspects of Proposition 200.

Current Litigation Concerning Voter ID Issues<sup>12</sup>

Litigation is filled with uncertainty. Litigation stemming from newly passed voter identification requirements will continue into the foreseeable future. Lawsuits are currently pending over voter identification requirements in Georgia and Indiana. Other states, such as Ohio, are considering new identification requirements that could lead to further litigation. The Georgia lawsuit has already succeeded in getting a preliminary injunction against the law in question, which will likely galvanize interested parties in other states to pursue similar litigation. Of course, if the injunction is eventually overturned at the appellate level it could have a similar chilling affect on future litigation.

This summary major litigation pending in Georgia and Indiana includes a brief assessment of the likelihood of success:

<sup>12</sup> As of January 2, 2006

Georgia (Common Cause/Georgia v. Billups):

On September 19, 2005, Common Cause of Georgia, in conjunction with several other non-profit organizations, filed suit in Federal District Court against the Georgia Secretary of State and other election officials, challenging the constitutionality of Georgia's new voter identification requirements. The new law requires all voters attempting to cast a ballot in person to present a valid form of photographic identification. O.C.G.A. § 21-2-417. A voter that is unable to provide proper identification is given a provisional ballot. However, that provisional ballot will be counted only if the voter is able to subsequently present valid identification within two days of the election. Id.

The lawsuit alleges five separate violations of state and federal law. First, the complaint alleges that the identification requirements infringe on the right to vote guaranteed in the Georgia constitution (Compl. 32)<sup>13</sup>. In addition, the Plaintiffs claim violations of the Federal Civil Rights Act and Voting Rights Act. (Compl. 36,38). Finally, the lawsuit alleges violations of the Fourteenth and Twenty-Fourth amendments to the U.S. Constitution. The complaint claims that the ID requirements constitute an "undue burden" on the right to vote, in violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment (Compl. 34). The ID requirement does not apply to most absentee voters, and thus the requirement is also over-broad and not narrowly tailored to address the stated purpose of preventing voter fraud (Compl. 34). The complaint further alleges that the cost of obtaining a photo ID constitutes a poll tax, in violation of the Twenty-Fourth Amendment, and that the cost is also a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment because it applies to voters who choose to vote in person, and not to those who vote absentee (Compl. 34,35).

On October 18, 2005, the District Court granted the Plaintiff's motion for a preliminary injunction, enjoining the application of the new identification requirements. In granting the injunction, the court held that both federal constitutional claims had a substantial likelihood of succeeding on the merits at trial (Prelim. Inj. 96, 104). The court also held that, while the two federal statutory claims were plausible, they both lacked sufficient evidence at the time to have a substantial likelihood of success. (Prelim. Inj. 109,111,116). Finally, the court held that the Georgia constitutional claim would be barred by the Eleventh Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. (Prelim. Inj. 77).

The Defendants appealed the motion for preliminary injunction to the Eleventh Circuit, and oral argument is scheduled for March 1, 2006. In addition, some news reports have claimed that the Georgia legislature is considering re-visiting the ID requirements in light of the on-going litigation.<sup>14</sup> As for the merits, in granting the preliminary injunction the District Court has already signaled its belief that the federal constitutional claims are likely meritorious. The Eleventh Circuit may have a different view, but for now the case looks to have a reasonable chance of success.

Indiana (Indiana Democratic Party v. Rokita and Crawford v. Marion County Election Board):

The Indiana lawsuit is similar to its Georgia counterpart in content, though not in status. In Indiana separate lawsuits, now joined, were filed by the state Democratic Party and the Indiana Civil Liberties Union (ICLU). The Democratic Party's lawsuit is directed against the Indiana Secretary of State, while the ICLU's lawsuit involves the Marion County Board of Elections and the State of Indiana. Like Georgia, Indiana law also requires citizens voting in person to present some form of official photo identification. IC § 3-11-8-25.1. Voters unable to present identification are given a provisional ballot, which is counted if they are able to provide the required identification by Noon on the second Monday following the election. IC § 3-11.7-5-1. Unlike Georgia, Indiana provides state issued identification at no charge. However, there are costs involved in the process, including transportation to the Bureau of Motor Vehicles, and payment for documents such as birth certificates, which are needed to obtain the ID. (Second Am. Compl. 6).

The Democratic Party's complaint raises Fourteenth Amendment claims similar to those in the Georgia lawsuit, including concerns about substantially burdening the right to vote, the enactment of a de-facto poll tax from the costs indirectly associated with obtaining ID, and the lack of applicability to voters who cast an absentee ballot. (Second Am. Compl. 6-9). In addition, the complaint alleges that the substantial burden placed on the right to vote violates the First Amendment protection of expressive or symbolic speech, as well as the freedom of association as applied to Democratic primary elections. (Second Am. Compl. 9-10). Finally, the complaint alleges violations of the Voting Rights Act, National Voter Registration Act, and the Help America Vote Act (Second Am. Compl. 10-11). The ICLU's complaint alleges many of the same violations, but also includes claims of a violation of Indiana's constitutional guarantee of a free and equal election system. (Compl. 15)

The case is currently in the pre-trial phase, with both sides awaiting decisions on their respective motions for summary judgment.<sup>15</sup> The likelihood of success is bolstered by the fact that the Fourteenth amendment constitutional claims have already been found persuasive by at least one other Federal District Court. However, the Indiana law is notably different than its Georgia counterpart in that it provides free identification. While the plaintiffs make a solid argument that related costs still amount to a poll-tax, it is possible that the court could distinguish on this matter.

Unlike the Georgia case, the Indiana lawsuit also claims a violation of the Help America Vote Act. Although the claim is not completely clear, it seems as though the Plaintiffs are arguing that the Indiana statute requires more stringent identification than what is required by HAVA. 42 U.S.C. § 15483(b)(1)-(2). While this is true, it is unclear how this violates the statute. HAVA merely states that certain voters unable to produce HAVA required identification be given a provisional ballot. Id. Indiana law meets this requirement. IC § 3-11-8-25.1. Although Indiana law requires more stringent identification for counting the provisional ballot, HAVA leaves these decisions to state law. 42 U.S.C. § 15482(a).

<sup>15</sup> According to an AP article, the Plaintiffs filed some type of brief on December 21—however it is not yet up on the Moritz website and I am unsure how to access it otherwise.

Subject Comments regarding the Eagleton Report on Voter ID

Karen,

As you requested, here are my comments regarding the final draft Eagleton report on Voter ID.

While the report is generally acceptable, I don't believe the current draft is ready to be released.

I found some parts of the report to be misleading and, at times, appearing biased to support a view that imposing ID requirements at the polls should be discouraged. As an example, on the first page they write about poll workers facing "long lines and limited time," suggesting that may be a problem for the workers to check ID. I am not sure what their point may be, as poll workers in states that require ID checking will still have to do so, no matter how long the voter lines they have. Many states and their polling places may not have long lines at the polls, and thus voters may not have the "limited time" suggested in the report. They don't support their suggestion with hard data on long voter lines and time limits on poll workers.

They selectively quote the Carter-Baker Commission study to suggest that "photographic ID requirements for in-person voting do little to address the problem of registration by mail" even though the Carter-Baker study actually promotes the idea of a photographic ID requirement at the polls. To be fair, they need to state that fact and the reasons why the Carter-Baker Commission comes to that conclusion.

Their table on page 7 indicates that Missouri's current ID requirement for first-time voters relies on HAVA requirements. It is my understanding that Missouri law requires that all voters must show some type of ID at the polls (therefore it should state "Provide ID" as they did in listing CO, CN and LA requirements).

On page 9 and on subsequent pages they make reference to "voting age population" (VAP) data issued by the Census Bureau. Is all the data they represent in their analysis based on the VAP or do they take into consideration the Citizen Voting Age Population (CVAP), which takes into account the number of non-citizens who may be included in the VAP? It is not clear from the report. You may remember that Kim Brace discussed the VAP vs. CVAP issue with us extensively, and he indicated that the CVAP figure is always the better one to use when analyzing Census Bureau data against voting data. He also said that many of the non-citizens included in the VAP figures tend to be Hispanic. And since the Eagleton study is making conclusions that indicate that more stringent ID requirements may tend to reduce Hispanic voter turnout, it becomes important to understand which figures Eagleton uses, as Kim told us that VAP figures do not compensate for the non-citizen Hispanic voters that are included at a higher rate in the VAP (because as Kim stated most of the non-citizen population in the USA tends to be Hispanic).

I would like to know if the new Census report data on the 2004 election released on March 15, 2006 changes any of their perspectives. <http://www.census.gov/prod/2006pubs/p20-556.pdf>

On page 12 they make reference to the CPS data and indicate that it reported a voter turnout rate of 89%, which is much higher than other data reported (which is also explained in their narrative). However, while the report indicates that the CPS data is "widely-accepted," it does make clear by whom. I think for credibility reasons they need more supporting language since there is a significant difference between a self-reported turnout of 89% and the reality of 63%.

Considering that the beginning of the document reveals a bias towards lesser ID requirements, I believe that it is important to highlight earlier in the report the conclusion found on page 14 that concerns by critics of voter identification requirements for African-American and elderly voters "are not borne out by the results." This will provide at least some balance to the reader.

On page 20 they indicate they lack good data on why voters must cast their ballots provisionally. I thought that our Election Day Survey captured some of that data.

It appears that a preponderance of their citations are from organizations or groups that support liberal positions on election issues, or take selective information from reports to support a more liberal interpretation of views on voter ID issues. Examples would include: Carter-Baker on page 1; Tova Wang on page 4; Carter-Baker on page 4; Brennan Center page 20. While many of published articles cited on pages 30 and 31 provide relatively neutral information, those that appear to take positions (read from the description of the articles) appear to favor a liberal position on most ID issues. I would have hoped they would have provided a more balanced approach. I don't see conservative writers, such as Thor Hearne, of the American Center for Voting Rights, quoted or cited once in the report. Mr. Hearne has testified before Congress and has had several articles that address voter identification issues.

I was pleased that they cited (on page 5) a recent March 15, 2006 article from the Arizona Republic that indicated that their stricter voter ID law went smoothly in its first use.

They might want to be aware (and perhaps mention) that the recommendation from Edward Foley cited on the bottom of page 21 was actually used in Haiti's recent February 7, 2006 presidential election. In addition to each voter being provided a picture ID by the election commission, that same picture was found next to the voters' name on the voter rolls that were used at the polling places. Perhaps they want to contact Scott Lansell of IFES for confirmation. The picture ID project for Haiti's election was financed and implemented by the Organization for American States (OAS). I believe turnout for that election was over 60% of those eligible.

Please let me know if you or anyone from Eagleton has questions regarding these comments. Thanks.

Minutes of the Standards Board Meeting
United States Election Assistance Commission
May 23-24, 2006

The following are the Minutes of the Standards Board Meeting of the United States Election Assistance Commission ("EAC") held on May 24, 2006, at the Hamilton Crowne Plaza Hotel, Hamilton Ballroom, 1001 14th Street, Washington, D.C. 20005. The meeting on May 23rd convened at 12:00 noon and ended at 5:30 p.m. The May 24th meeting convened at 10:00a.m. and convened at 3:40 p.m.

Call to order:

Chair called the meeting to order at 12:00 noon.

STANDARDS BOARD MEETING

Staff

Brian Hancock, Director of Voting System Testing & Certification
Peggy Simms, Election Research Specialist
Laiza Otero, EAC Research Associate
Karen Lynn-Dyson, EAC Research Manager
Juliet Thompson-Hodgkins, General Counsel
Edgardo Cortés, EAC Election Research Specialist

Presenters

Connie Schmidt, EAC consultant; Brit Williams, EAC consultant; Dr. Thad Hall, University of Utah; Doug Chapin, electionline.org

Proceedings:

Brief opening remarks from Vice Chairman Ray Martinez

- Goal of the meetings is to give a full briefing of all the research projects that the EAC is working on.

EAC Staff/Consultants Presentations:

Legal On-Line Information Clearinghouse

Presenter: Julie Thompson-Hodgkins, EAC General Counsel

Ms. Hodgkins discussed the need for a website to provide public access to centralized legal materials related to elections. It will give information on current statutes and cases in a user friendly format. The focus will be anything in the state or federal legislative arena that would impact the legislations process. The cases will be briefed by the contractors so the person doing the search does not have to read the whole case. It will be a link to the EAC home page.

Design for Democracy

Presenter: Rick Korfe, American Institute of Graphic Art

The project is about effective design in election administration with a focus on clear communication and increasing citizen participation. The project aims at building expertise and using new research to create models for optical scan ballots and polling place signage. The group set up a room so that they may gain input from the attendees of the standards board.

Public Access Portals & Spanish and Asian Language Working Groups

Presenter: Edgardo Cortes, EAC Research Specialist

Publius.org:

EAC awarded a contract to Publius.org to conduct a study which will examine and create a best practices document about Public Access Portals. They reviewed 425 jurisdictions and started looking at what kind of information they provided on their websites. They have also conducted interviews with personnel and administrators that run those sites. From the research they found the most popular function was people wanting to check their registration status and their polling place site. The draft should be ready by mid to late summer.

Spanish and Asian Languages:

There have been many demographic changes throughout the country and pursuant to the Voting Rights Act, under Section 203, many jurisdictions who didn't before, now must provide information in alternate languages. The Commission decided to bring together working groups consisting of election administrators, advocacy groups and other individuals who deal with these issues first hand.

- First project was the Hispanic working group, as Spanish is the largest alternative language with which jurisdictions are dealing
- The second project was the Asian and Pacific Islander working group including: Japanese, Chinese, Korean, Vietnamese and Tagalog.
- Hopefully next year we will begin working on Native American languages
- Working on translation dictionaries
- Dialects have been a challenge, with regional translations for the same term.

Roll Call and welcoming of members and staff at 1:35 p.m.

Standards Board Plenary Session (Hamilton Ballroom), Chaired by Peggy Nighswonger, Chair, Executive Board

- Appointment of Parliamentarian
  - Secretary Kiffmeyer (MN) appointed
- Adoption of the agenda
- Review of Meeting Book Materials
- Briefing on re-adoption of Standards Board Charter
  - Motion for adoption by Rebecca Vigil Gorom
  - Kevin Kennedy seconds, motion is carried
- Election of Executive Board Vacancy

Afternoon Presentations

Draft Report on Provisional Voting (Hamilton Ballroom)

Presenters: Thomas O'Neill, Provisional Voting/Voter Identification Study; Tim Vercollotti, Eagleton Institute; Edward Foley, Election Law at Moritz (Ohio State University)

Surveyed 400 local officials and reviewed the EAC Election Day Survey. With that information analysis was done to find the issues that the states had with Provisional Voting and the litigation that ensued. HAVA allows considerable latitude on how to implement provisional voting and the variation among the states is enormous. The time taken to evaluate the ballots increased the accuracy and therefore the percentage of ballots actually counted.

- Lack of adequate staffing was found to be a problem with the smaller, lower income jurisdictions, and they reported more provisional ballots cast
- Difference between the rules on the books and the rules as they were enforced in practice.
- Most received provisional voting instructions from the states, but training and procedures was found to be lacking, ie: not going back to the original voter registration cards
- About 1.2 million (1% of the turnout) voted by provisional vote

Interim announcement after the afternoon break:

With 66 votes, Tonni Bartholomew, City Clerk of Troy, MI, was voted in as the newest member of the Executive Board to fill the vacancy.

Research on Poll Worker recruitment, training and retention (including college poll workers (Hamilton Ballroom))

Presenters: Jennifer Collins-Foley, IFES; Abby Horn, Cleveland State University

IFES is an International program offering technical systems to jurisdictions in the US, and vice versa. Foley has been working as the President of the Poll Worker Institute. They have been working with Cleveland State University over the past 13 months to compile 50 state laws as they apply to poll workers to compile field-tested practices in poll worker recruiting, training and retention.

- Conducted focus groups with the League of Women Voters and are developing a how-to practical guide book.
- Two major hindering factors to bringing in new poll workers are the age requirement and the residency requirement.
- League of Women Voters in a 3 month period did 19 focus groups in 17 jurisdictions. Their analysis came back with results stating that election officials often work on shoe string budgets, have limited staff and work in an environment which historically, before HAVA, didn't require much change.
- Found it was difficult to recruit poll workers in both low and very high income areas.
- It was also especially difficult to find tech savvy poll workers in economically disadvantaged areas.
- They will be testing this guidebook in 3 jurisdictions this summer: Hamilton County, OH; Santa Fe, NM; and Milwaukee, WI

Abigail Horn from the Centre for Election Integrity, Cleveland State University:

There are several reasons why getting college students involved is an ideal situation. Besides that fact that they are tech savvy, with flexible schedules, there is also the idea that if you get them involved at an early age, there is a good chance that they will remain in a real way in the democratic process. It may not be as a poll worker, but perhaps in other ways. There are some serious hurdles to overcome in implementing these programs, however.

- Students not registered in the same state or in the county (or precinct in some places) where they are living and where their college is.
  - In 2004 the EAC provided grants to 15 different colleges and non profits to run college poll worker programs.
  - They looked at statutory law in all 50 states and territories with all case law pertaining to college poll workers
  - Also looked at the administrative code and state constitutions

- An idea was building a course around citizenship or giving extra credit for the project.
- Another problem is retention and sustainability in college poll worker programs.
  - It's difficult to plan on having students having excused absences for working on election day. That can be a major administrative problem that would need to be planned 9-10 months ahead of time
- Training on campus should be very hands-on with an emphasis on intergenerational communication.
- Getting commitments from college students is somewhat challenging as sometimes last minute projects come up and they are unable to work.

Comments from the Board members--and shortly after the meeting was adjourned by Chair Nighswonger at 5:35 p.m.

DAY 2 OF THE STANDARDS BOARD MEETING

Meeting convened at 8:30 a.m. by Chair Nighswonger in the Hamilton Ballroom at the Crowne Plaza Hotel in Washington, DC.

Election Management Guidelines (intro by Brian Hancock, EAC)

Presenters: Connie Schmidt, Johnson County, KS election commissioner; Brit Williams, NASED Board

B. Hancock:

Up to this point there have been three editions of standards or guidelines for voting systems or voting equipment. NASED has been calling for the development of Election Management Guidelines to compliment the voting systems standards. The EAC agrees that this effort is overdue and we have entered into a contract with several groups that will spearhead a three year project.

C. Schmidt:

Need to define exactly what Election Management Guidelines are. We don't want to invent something, but rather collect information that's already in place out there and create a resource book for all of you and every local election and state administrator in the country. It should be a rather generic guidebook with which you can voluntarily implement pieces and parts.

A project that will be distributed is the Quick Start Guide for Voting Systems Management which highlights some priority items.

Research on vote count/recount (Hamilton Ballroom)

Presenters: Dr. Thad Hall, University of Utah; Doug Chapin, Electionline.org

Vote counting systems should incorporate eight fundamental principles of vote counting: transparency, security, professionalism, accuracy, secrecy, timeliness, accountability and equality.

Recounts should perceive final certification of the result. They determine whether or not the numbers at the bottom of the page are the correct numbers for one of more given races. Procedures vary across the country and can be triggered either automatically, by request, by a candidate's party, or advocates or the others. And there is also variation on who pays for the recounts.

Using "benchmarking", they are looking for the most efficient practices to create baseline.

One major problem is that there are so many judges and clerks who have never read the election law which they have on the books, and when a highly contentious dispute comes along, it could be a difficult resolution.

Draft EAC Election Day Survey

Presenter: Laiza Otero, EAC Research Associate

In 2004 the EAC conducted the Election Day Survey (EDS) and also administered a survey on the impact of the National Voter Registration Act (NVRA) and on the Uniformed and Overseas Citizens Absentee Voters Act (UOCAVA). Each of the three surveys was administered to all 50 states, the District of Columbia, and the four U.S. Territories. The NVRA study was inherited from the Federal Election Commission when the EAC was created, but this was the first time the Election Day Survey was administered. The UOCAVA survey was only 10 questions and was required by the Help America Vote Act (HAVA).

- Some challenges for the UOCAVA study included states not responding to some question, creating some issues with data quality and the inability to have good analysis.
- The next version of the EDS will be available online so that states may respond in that way.

006420

- Question 4 of the UOCAVA survey will be omitted this time, and will probably be back on in 2008.

Bill Campbell offers an amendment to the minutes”

“I want to add that we affixed to that the resolutions that were adopted by the Standards Board in the meeting in August either as an appendix or just an extension of minutes”

Chair Nighswonger: No objections. Amendment was added.

Research on Voting Fraud/Voter Intimidation

Presenter: Margaret Peggy Simms, EAC Research Specialist

This research is being done under HAVA's mandate and among the tasks listed in this statute is the development of nationwide statistics and methods of identifying, deterring, and investigating voter fraud in elections for federal office and investigating methods of voter intimidation.

EAC put together a bipartisan team of Joe Serebrov from Little Rock, AK and Tova Wang from the Century Foundation to conduct the background research.

- Research found that the literature on voter fraud is not truly systematic or scientific and the books and documents have little follow-up and many have political biases.
- Literature suggests that much of the intimidation is focused on minority communities.
- Upon interviewing members of the private and public sector involved in these issues agreed that absentee ballot fraud is the biggest problem.
- According to federal statutes, in order to prosecute intimidation, there has to be an economic or physical threat attached, where the consultants wanted to look at situations in which voters are being made to feel uncomfortable.
- Also mentioned were cases of voting by the deceased; vote buying (investigations concentrated in KY, IL, and WV), and misinformation campaigns
- The working group which gathered at the EAC suggested conducting risk analysis for voting fraud and voter intimidation.

Afternoon session: Resolutions

HAVA specifies that the Executive Board make recommendations to the full board on resolutions regarding standard support business. Adam Ambrogi read the resolution aloud to the Board.

Draft Resolution 2006-01: Resolved that the Standards Board recommends the EAC carefully review each study and recommendation of researchers to ensure that findings are based on facts that are clearly defended by quantitative data rather than suspicions or assumptions. Also, the EAC requires researchers to study and report on the practicality and expense of implementing such changes.

Draft Resolution 2006-02: The EAC Standards Board charter states that the annual cost for operating the Standards Board includes one quarter year staff for support and it has been determined that a need for such staffing is present. It is resolved that the EAC adhere to the provision of the charter and dedicate staff support. The EAC staff person shall provide early and timely notice to the Board relative to proposed meetings to allow active participation of such meetings.

Draft Resolution 2006-03: HAVA requires the EAC to report on finite and specific topics that are clearly listed in the law; whereas taxpayer dollars are being used to prepare these reports at a great deal of expense in terms of funding and time. These reports are funded to contractors. Resolved that the Standards Board recommends that the EAC adhere strictly to the plain language meaning of HAVA where it clearly lists specific topics that are to be reported on and the parameters thereof without assuming tangential issues or taking action that would lead to an increased project scope.

- Draft Resolution 2006-01 adopted
- Draft Resolution 2006-02 adopted
- Draft Resolution 2006-03 adopted with a quorum of 59

Draft Resolution 2006-04: Whereas the internet can be used to train poll workers, resolved that the EAC develop an internet training template that state and local jurisdictions can use to create and manage internet based poll worker training programs.

- Amendment: change "resolved" to say "resolved that the Standards Board recommends the US Election Assistance Commission development"
- Amendment adopted to the resolution
- The motion fails 30 to 25.

Meeting adjourned at 3:40 p.m.

Subject Executive Board Nominations Process

Sheila,

Commissioner Hillman expressed some concern about the language in one of the clauses that discusses procedures for nominating replacements for the Executive Board. I agree that the language as it is written may be unworkable for the Board. I suggest changing the language in Article V, Section 1, paragraph b, clause ii to:

In the event of a vacancy on the Executive Board prior to the expiration of a member's term on the Executive Board, the Nominating Committee shall send to Standards Board members a solicitation no later than sixty (60) days before the next meeting of the Standards Board. The solicitations shall designate the address and form for submitting nominations.

Any thoughts?

Thanks,

Subject: Guidance for CFR Submissions

I. Background:

This memorandum reviews the actions necessary to reserve and publish the United States Election Assistance Commission's (EAC) administrative and program regulations in the Code of Federal Regulations (CFR).

II. Establishment:

Agencies wishing to publish in the CFR must consult with personnel at the Federal Register (FR) to reserve sections of the code for their use. The EAC has been given an assignment in Title 11, Chapter 2, Parts 9400-9499 of the CFR. Chapter 2 of Title 11 currently houses the Federal Election Commission (FEC) and its regulations. To accept the designation, the EAC must send a letter to FR on the EAC Executive Director's letterhead formalizing its placement and designating three primary and three alternate officers to work with FR staff.<sup>1</sup>

The EAC must designate a minimum of one liaison officer, one certifying officer, and one authorizing officer; in addition to a minimum of one alternate for each position. All officers must be federal employees and may not be contract employees. The same person may fill several positions as long as the primary and alternate positions for one category are not filled by the same person. For example, the General Counsel could be the liaison officer, alternate certifying officer, and authorizing officer. The General Counsel could not, however be both the primary and alternate liaison officer.

The following is a description of each officer's duties:

- A. Liaison Officer: The person holding this position acts as the agency's official voice with FR for publication matters. All special handling requests, including emergencies, deferred, or immediate publishing, must go through the liaison officer or alternate liaison officer. The liaison officer is also required to resolve document questions and ensure that agency documents meet FR publication requirements<sup>2</sup>.
- B. Certifying Officer: The person holding this position certifies that any copies of originals submitted to FR are exact copies. In addition, for electronic submissions, the certifying officer certifies that electronic files are exact and official copies of documents.
- C. Authorizing Officer: The person holding this position distributes paper copies to EAC employees when necessary and handles all requests for hard copies.

III. Structure:

The FR issued a handbook that instructs federal agencies on how to structure CFR regulations and format documents for inclusion in the FR<sup>3</sup>. The CFR units from most general to most specific are Title, Chapter, Part, and Section. A section can further be divided by six levels<sup>4</sup>:

Level 1: (a), (b), (c)

Level 2: (1), (2), (3)

Level 3: (i), (ii), (iii)

Level 4: (A), (B), (C)

Level 5: (1), (2), (3)

Level 6: (i), (ii), (iii)

The FR does not permit the use of hyphenated numbers (ex. 117-2.1) or numbers with alpha characters (ex. part 115a). Any deviation from the standard CFR structure must be approved in writing before publication.

The FR recommends that agencies reserve parts in between initial designations as it is extremely difficult to go back and re-number parts once they are assigned. For example, the EAC could call part 9401 “Administration,” label parts 9402-9404 as “Reserved,” and call part 9405 “Voting Systems,” therefore keeping open the unused numbers for future additions if logic dictates that program areas should be located after Administration and before Voting Systems. The EAC may wish to reference regulations issued by the Department of Homeland Security for examples of how a new agency has numbered its parts.

IV. National Voter Registration Act of 1993:

Section 802 of the Help America Vote Act transferred functions previously performed by the Federal Election Commission (FEC) under the National Voter Registration Act of 1993 (NVRA) to the EAC. Accordingly, the EAC must publish regulations relating to NVRA in its section of the CFR.

The preferred method for moving regulations previously under another section is to do a joint rulemaking. To remove NVRA from Chapter 1 and add it to Chapter 2, an authorized official from each agency must sign a jointly issued or common rule document. The EAC’s liaison officer must consult with FR staff in advance for assistance in preparing jointly issued documents.

Simultaneously with the joint rulemaking moving NVRA regulations, the EAC can amend NVRA to reflect agency decisions and changes to NVRA regulations since the EAC was granted authority under the Act. The EAC may wish to reference regulations issued by the Presidio Trust for an example of a joint rulemaking that removes parts and places them elsewhere.

V. Voluntary Voting System Guidelines and Similar Guidance:

In 2005, the EAC adopted its first version of the Voluntary Voting System Guidelines (VVSG), which revised the FEC's Voting System Standards. The VVSG makes hardware and software recommendations for voting systems based on existing law and best practices. While the guidance is voluntary, some states make compliance with VVSG recommendations a requirement by statute or rule. In addition, the EAC's Voting System Certification Program will only allow voting systems to receive EAC certification if they conform to the VVSG. It is possible that several versions of the VVSG may be acceptable for EAC certification purposes at the same time. Therefore, the EAC must have some manner of including all "live" versions of the VVSG in the CFR.

There are two ways to the EAC may wish to include the VVSG in the CFR. First, the EAC can reformat the VVSG and re-submit it for publication to conform to FR's numbering scheme. The benefit of resubmitting the VVSG would be that once the document is re-formatted and re-published, any amendments to the document may be done in a piece-meal fashion instead of having to re-publish each version. However, this may cause confusion as to which version of the VVSG is live at any given time. In addition, re-formatting and re-publishing will be costly to the agency.

The EAC may instead wish to incorporate the VVSG by reference. The benefit of incorporating the VVSG by reference is that amendments to the document can be noted by amending the incorporation by reference statement instead of re-publishing each change. The EAC may wish to reference regulations issued by the Federal Aviation Administration for examples of incorporation by reference and codification of certification programs.

VI. Recommendations:

- 1) The EAC should designate personnel to the three types of officer positions and send a letter to the FR accepting its sections in the CFR.
- 2) The EAC should make a list of program areas for publication in the CFR and create a superstructure for its parts and subparts.
- 3) The EAC should contact the General Counsel's office at FEC to coordinate removing NVRA regulations from their 11 CFR 1 to 11 CFR 2. The removal should coincide with amendments to NVRA regulations that EAC deems appropriate and necessary.
- 4) The EAC should conference with the FR's general counsel to obtain guidance concerning incorporation by reference and the best way to proceed with large guidance documents such as the VVSG.

Subject Draft Voting Fraud and Voter Intimidation Report

Commissioners and Tom,

I have attached a draft version of the EAC Voting Fraud and Voter Intimidation report. Please have your comments ready no later than Tuesday, Nov. 28, COB, so that I will be prepared to discuss them at our briefing on Wednesday, Nov. 29 at 10:30.

You will note that there are appendixes referenced in the report. These documents are quite lengthy. Thus, I did not attach them to this email. If, however, you want to read the documents, DeAnna has access to them in my absence and can either email them to you or print them for you.

I think that the report is fairly self-explanatory. However, there are two questions that we need to address and that the Commissioners need to comment on:

1. The consultants provided summaries of articles, books, and reports that they read, as well as summaries of the interviews that they conducted. Peggy created two tables summarizing the consultants' summaries of books, article and reports as well as interviews. We need to make a determination of which summaries we want to attach as appendixes. The only issue that I am aware of (and I have a question pending to Peggy about the quality of these summaries) is a significant disagreement over the summaries of interviews with Craig Donsanto and John Tanner of the Dept. of Justice. They disagree with the characterization given by the consultants to what they said in the interview. Obviously, this matter would have to be resolved if we decide to use the consultants' summaries.

2. Tom and I had a conversation with Tova and Job about the fact that we are going to issue a report. Tova was quite insistent about being able to see the report before it is released. I am NOT inclined to give her a copy of the report before it is released. Neither Tova nor Job are still on contract with the EAC. Thus, they are just like any other member of the public. I believe that if we release it to them, then we may have a significant problem withholding the document from others that may ask for it via FOIA request. I believe that the course of action should be to release it to all persons simultaneously.

Happy reading and Happy Thanksgiving!

Subject Fraud Report

Julie:

When you draft proposed language for the DOJ interview section, I am asking that you put yourself in the position of the consultants. Ask yourself how you would want EAC to present this difference of opinion between what DOJ says it meant and what the consultants heard and wrote, as if you were the consultant.

Also, I just want to be clear that while I agree that we should include DOJ's retort, I do not believe we should "re-write" what the consultants presented. Rather, we should leave it intact and present the consultants writings in a context that addresses DOJ's objections.

Thanks,
Gracia

Interview with Craig Donsanto, Director, Elections Crimes Branch, Public Integrity Section, U.S. Department of Justice
January 13, 2006

The Department of Justice's (DOJ) Election Crimes Branch is responsible for supervising federal criminal investigations and prosecutions of election crimes.

Questions

How are Prosecution Decisions Made?

Craig Donsanto must approve all investigations that go beyond a preliminary stage, all charges, search warrant applications and subpoenas and all prosecutions. The decision to investigate is very sensitive because of the public officials involved. If a charge seems political, Donsanto will reject it. Donsanto gives possible theories for investigation. Donsanto and Noel Hillman will decide whether to farm out the case to an Assistant U.S. Attorney (AUSA). Donsanto uses a concept called predication. In other words, there must be enough evidence to suggest a crime has been committed. The method of evaluation of this evidence depends on the type of evidence and its source. There are two types of evidence---factual (antisocial behavior) and legal (antisocial behavior leading to statutory violations). Whether an indictment will be brought depends on the likelihood of success before a jury. Much depends on the type of evidence and the source. Donsanto said he "knows it when he sees it." Donsanto will only indict if he is confident of a conviction assuming the worst case scenario - a jury trial.

A person under investigation will first receive a target letter. Often, a defendant who gets a target letter will ask for a departmental hearing. The defendant's case will be heard by Donsanto and Hillman. On occasion, the assistant attorney general will review the case. The department grants such hearings because such defendants are likely to provide information about others involved.

The Civil Rights Division, Voting Rights Section makes its own decisions on prosecution. The head of that division is John Tanner. There is a lot of cooperation between the Voting Section and the Election Crimes Branch.

Does the Decision to Prosecute Incorporate Particular Political Considerations within a State Such as a One Party System or a System in which the Party in Power Controls the Means of Prosecution and Suppresses Opposition Complaints?

Yes. Before, the department would leave it to the states. Now, if there is racial animus involved in the case, there is political bias involved, or the prosecutor is not impartial, the department will take it over.

Deleted: f

Does it Matter if the Complaint Comes from a Member of a Racial Minority?

No. But if the question involves racial animus, that has also always been an aggravating

| factor, making it more likely the department will take it over

Deleted: D

What Kinds of Complaints Would Routinely Override Principles of Federalism?

Federalism is no longer big issue. DOJ is permitted to prosecute whenever there is a candidate for federal office on the ballot.

Are There Too Few Prosecutions?

DOJ can't prosecute everything.

What Should Be Done to Improve the System?

The problem is asserting federal jurisdiction in non-federal elections. It is preferable for the federal government to pursue these cases for the following reasons: federal districts draw from a bigger and more diverse jury pool; the DOJ is politically detached; local district attorneys are hamstrung by the need to be re-elected; DOJ has more resources – local prosecutors need to focus on personal and property crimes---fraud cases are too big and too complex for them; DOJ can use the grand jury process as a discovery technique and to test the strength of the case.

In U.S. v. McNally, the court ruled that the mail fraud statute does not apply to election fraud. It was through the mail fraud statute that the department had routinely gotten federal jurisdiction over election fraud cases. 18 USC 1346, the congressional effort to “fix” McNally, did not include voter fraud.

As a result, the department needs a new federal law that allows federal prosecution whenever a federal instrumentality is used, e.g. the mail, federal funding, interstate commerce. The department has drafted such legislation, which was introduced but not passed in the early 1990s. A federal law is needed that permits prosecution in any election where any federal instrumentality is used.

Other Information

| The Department has held four symposia for District Election Officers (DEOs) and FBI agents since the initiation of the Ballot Access and Voting Integrity Initiative. In 2003, civil rights leaders were invited to make speeches, but were not permitted to take part in the rest of the symposium. All other symposia have been closed to the public. ,

There are two types of attorneys in the division: prosecutors, who take on cases when the jurisdiction of the section requires it; the US Attorney has recused him or herself; or when the US Attorney is unable to handle the case (most frequent reason) and braintrust attorneys who analyze the facts, formulate theories, and draft legal documents.

If we want more documents related to any case, we must get those documents from the states. The department will not release them to us.

Although the number of election fraud related complaints have not gone up since 2002, nor has the proportion of legitimate to illegitimate complaints of fraud, the number of cases that the department is investigating and the number of indictments the department is pursuing are both up dramatically.

Since 2002, the department has brought more cases against alien voters, felon voters, and double voters than ever before. Previously, cases were only brought against conspiracies to corrupt the process rather than individual offenders acting alone. For deterrence purposes, the Attorney General decided to add the pursuit of individuals who vote when not eligible to vote (noncitizens, felons) or who vote more than once. The department is currently undertaking three pilot projects to determine what works in developing the cases and obtaining convictions and what works with juries in such matters to gain convictions:

1. Felon voters in Milwaukee.
2. Alien voters in the Southern District of Florida. FYI – under 18 USC 611, to prosecute for “alien voting” there is no intent requirement. Conviction can lead to deportation. Nonetheless, the department feels compelled to look at mitigating factors such as was the alien told it was OK to vote, does the alien have a spouse that is a citizen.
3. Double voters in a variety of jurisdictions.

The department does not maintain records of the complaints that come in from DEOs, U.S attorneys and others during the election that are not pursued by the department. Donsanto asserted that U.S. attorneys never initiate frivolous investigations.

According to the new handbook, the department can take on a case whenever there is a federal candidate on the ballot

Interview with John Tanner, Chief, Voting Section, Civil Rights Division, U.S. Department of Justice

Deleted: Director

February 24, 2006

The Department of Justice's (DOJ) Voting Section is charged with the civil enforcement of the Voting Rights Act, the Uniformed and Overseas Citizens Absentee Voting Act (UOCAVA), the National Voter Registration Act (NVRA), and Title III of the Help America Vote Act (HAVA).

Authority and Process

The Voting Section, in contrast to the Public Integrity Section as Craig Donsanto described it, typically focuses only on systemic problems resulting from government action or inaction, not problems caused by individuals. Indeed, the section never goes after individuals because it does not have the statutory authority to do so. In situations in which individuals are causing problems at the polls and interfering with voting rights, the section calls the local election officials to resolve it.

Federal voting laws enforced by the section only apply to state action, so the section only sues state and local governments – it does not have any enforcement power over individuals. Most often, the section enters into consent agreements with governments that focus on poll worker training, takes steps to restructure how polls are run, and deals with problems on Election Day on the spot. Doing it this way has been most effective – for example, while the section used to have the most observers in the South, with systematic changes forced upon those jurisdictions, the section now does not get complaints from the South.

The section can get involved even where there is no federal candidate on the ballot if there is a racial issue under the 14th and 15th Amendments.

When the section receives a complaint, attorneys first determine whether it is a matter that involves individual offenders or a systemic problem. When deciding what to do with the complaint, the section errs on the side of referring it criminally to avoid having any civil litigation complicate a possible criminal case.

When a complaint comes in, the attorneys ask questions to see if there are even problems there that the complainant is not aware are violations of the law. For example, in the Boston case, the attorney did not just look at Spanish language cases under section 203, but also brought a Section 2 case for violations regarding Chinese and Vietnamese voters. When looking into a case, the attorneys look for specificity, witnesses and supporting evidence.

Often, lawsuits bring voluntary compliance.

Voter Intimidation

Deleted: Note: Mr. Tanner's reluctance to share data, information and his perspective on solving the problems presented an obstacle to conducting the type of interview that would help inform this project as much as we would have hoped. Mr. Tanner would not give us any information about or data from the section's election complaint in-take phone logs; data or even general information from the Interactive Case Management (ICM) system-its formal process for tracking and managing work activities in pursuing complaints and potential violations of the voting laws; and would give us only a selected few samples of attorney-observer reports, reports that every Voting Section attorney who is observing elections at poll sites on Election Day is required to submit. He would not discuss in any manner any current investigations or cases the section is involved in. He also did not believe it was his position to offer us recommendations as to how his office, elections, or the voting process might be improved.¶

Many instances of what some people refer to as voter intimidation are more unclear now. For example, photographing voters at the polls has been called intimidating, but now everyone is at the polls with a camera. It is hard to know when something is intimidation and it is difficult to show that it was an act of intimidation.

The fact that both parties are engaging in these tactics now makes it more complicated. It makes it difficult to point the finger at any one side.

The inappropriate use of challengers on the basis of race would be a violation of the law. Mr. Tanner was unaware that such allegations were made in Ohio in 2004. He said there had never been a formal investigation into the abusive use of challengers.

Deleted: n

Mr. Tanner said a lot of the challenges are legitimate because you have a lot of voter registration fraud as a result of groups paying people to register voters by the form. They turn in bogus registration forms. Then the parties examine the registration forms and challenge them because 200 of them, for example, have addresses of a vacant lot.

However, Mr. Tanner said the department was able to informally intervene in challenger situations in Florida, Atkinson County, Georgia and in Alabama, as was referenced in a February 23 Op-Ed in USA Today. Mr. Tanner reiterated the section takes racial targeting very seriously.

Deleted: D

Refusal to provide provisional ballots would be a violation of the law that the section would investigate.

Deceptive practices are committed by individuals and would be a matter for the Public Integrity Section. Local government would have to be involved for the Voting Section to become involved.

Deleted: voting

Deleted: s

Unequal implementation of ID rules, or asking minority voters only for ID would be something the section would go after. Mr. Tanner was unaware of allegations of this in 2004. He said this is usually a problem where you have language minorities and the poll workers cannot understand the voters when they say their names. The section has never formally investigated or solely focused a case based on abuse of ID provisions. However, implementation of ID rules was part of the Section 2 case in San Diego. Mr. Tanner reiterated that the section is doing more than ever before.

When asked about the section's references to incidents of vote fraud in the documents related to the new state photo identification requirements, Mr. Tanner said the section only looks at retrogression, not at the wisdom of what a legislature does. In Georgia, for example, everyone statistically has identification, and more blacks have ID than whites. With respect to the letter to Senator Kit Bond regarding voter ID, the section did refer to the perception of concern about dead voters because of reporting by the Atlanta Journal-Constitution. It is understandable that when you have thousands of bogus registrations that there would be concerns about polling place fraud. Very close elections make this even more of an understandable concern. Putting control of registration lists in the hands of the states will be helpful because at this higher level of government you find a higher level of professionalism.

It is hard to know how much vote suppression and intimidation is taking place because it depends on one's definition of the terms – they are used very loosely by some people. However, the enforcement of federal law over the years has made an astounding difference so that the level of discrimination has plummeted. Registration of minorities has soared, as can be seen on the section's website. Mr. Tanner was unsure if the same was true with respect to turnout, but the gap is less. That information is not on the section's website.

The section is not filing as many Section 2 cases as compared to Section 203 cases because many of the jurisdictions sued under Section 2 in the past do not have issues anymore. Mr. Tanner said that race based problems are rare now.

NVRA has been effective in opening up the registration process. In terms of enforcement, Mr. Tanner said they do what they can when they have credible allegations. There is a big gap between complaints and what can be substantiated. Mr. Tanner stated that given the high quality of the attorneys now in the section, if they do not investigate it or bring action, that act complained of did not happen.

Recommendations

Mr. Tanner did not feel it was appropriate to make recommendations.

Note: We contend that Mr. Tanner's reluctance to share data, information and his perspective on solving the problems presented an obstacle to conducting the type of interview that would help inform this project as much as we would have hoped. We did not have access to any information about or data from the section's election complaint intake phone logs or data or even general information from the Interactive Case Management (ICM) system-its formal process for tracking and managing work activities in pursuing complaints and potential violations of the voting laws. Only a selected few samples of attorney-observer reports were provided, reports that every Voting Section attorney who is observing elections at poll sites on Election Day is required to submit. Mr. Tanner would not discuss any current investigations or cases the section is involved in.

EAC REPORT ON VOTING FRAUD AND VOTER INTIMIDATION STUDY

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

The Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA) requires the U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC) to study a host of topics, including “voting fraud” and “voter intimidation.” In 2005, EAC embarked on an initial review of the existing knowledge of voting fraud and voter intimidation. The goal of that study was to develop a working definition of “voting fraud” and “voter intimidation” and to identify research methodology to conduct a comprehensive, nationwide study of these topics.

EAC staff along with two, bipartisan consultants reviewed the existing information available about voting fraud and voter intimidation, including reading articles, books and reports; interviewing subject matter experts; reviewing media reports of fraud and intimidation; and studying reported cases of prosecutions of these types of crimes. It is clear from this review that there is a great deal of debate on the pervasiveness of fraud in elections as well as what constitute the most common acts of fraud or intimidation. There is also no apparent consensus on the meaning of the phrases “voting fraud” and “voter intimidation.” Some think of voting fraud and voter intimidation only as criminal acts, while others include actions that may constitute civil wrongs, civil rights violations, and even legal activities.

In order to facilitate future study of these topics, EAC developed a working definition of “election crimes.” “Election crimes” are intentional acts or willful failures to act, prohibited by state or federal law, that are designed to cause ineligible persons to participate in the election process; eligible persons to be excluded from the election process; ineligible votes to be cast in an election; eligible votes not to be cast or counted; or other interference with or invalidation of election results. Election crimes generally fall into one of four categories: acts of deception, acts of coercion, acts of damage or destruction, and failures or refusals to act.

From EAC’s review of existing information on the issue, it was apparent that there have been a number of studies that touched on various topics and regions of the country concerning voting fraud and intimidation, but that there had never been a comprehensive, nationwide study of these topics. EAC will conduct further research to provide a comprehensive, nationwide look at “election crimes.” Future EAC study of this topic will focus on election-related, criminal activity and will not include acts that are exclusively civil wrongs, campaign finance violations, and violations of ethical provisions. EAC will study these concepts by surveying the states’ chief election officials about complaints they received, election crime investigation units regarding complaints received and those referred to law enforcement, and law enforcement and prosecutorial agencies regarding complaints received, charges filed, and final disposition of each complaint.

- Comment [GH1]: Ethical provisions of what?
- Comment [GH2]: We should learn about all complaints received by election officials, not just those received through the admin complaint process.
- Deleted: through their administrative complaint processes
- Comment [GH3]: Our study should also include final disposition of each case where charges were filed.

What is not an Election Crime for Purposes of this Study.doc

What is not an Election Crime for Purposes of this Study

There are some actions or inactions that may constitute crimes or civil wrongs that we do not include in our definition of "election crimes." All criminal or civil violations related to campaign finance contribution limitations, prohibitions, and reporting either at the state or federal level are not "election crimes" for purposes of this study and any future study conducted by EAC. Similarly, criminal acts that are unrelated to elections, voting, or voter registration are not "election crimes," even when those offenses occur in a polling place, voter registration office, or a candidate's office or appearance. For example, an assault or battery that results from a fight in a polling place or at a candidate's office is not an election crime. Last, violations of ethical provisions and the Hatch Act are not "election crimes." Similarly, civil or other wrongs that do not rise to the level of criminal activity (i.e., a misdemeanor, relative felony or felony) are not "election crimes."

Survey Chief Election Officers Regarding Administrative Complaints

Likely sources of complaints concerning election crimes are the administrative complaint processes that states were required to establish to comply with Section 402 of HAVA. These complaint procedures were required to be in place prior to a state receiving any funds under HAVA. Citizens are permitted to file complaints alleging violations of HAVA Title III provisions under these procedures with the state's chief election official. Those complaints must be resolved within 60 days. The procedures also allow for alternative dispute resolution of claims. Some states have expanded this process to include complaints of other violations, such as election crimes.

In order to determine how many of these complaints allege the commission of election crimes, EAC will survey the states' chief election officers regarding complaints that have been filed, investigated, and resolved since January 1, 2004. The data collected will also include complaints that have been filed outside of the administrative complaint procedures. EAC will use the definition of election crimes provided above in this report in its survey so that data regarding a uniform set of offenses will be collected.

Comment [GH2]: We can be pretty certain that legitimate complaints will be filed outside of the Admin Complaint Procedure.

Subject Draft EAC report on Voter Identification

Chair Davidson and Tom-

You may recall that during your last Commissioner's meeting you requested that a draft of the EAC Voter ID report be ready by January 5. Attached please find the first draft of such a report that I have prepared, based on the Eagleton Voter ID report and study.

There are several points in the document where I raise questions about the data or Eagleton's findings from their analysis. Certainly, before we would publish this report, we would need Eagleton to review it and to verify that we have accurately represented their findings and conclusions.

Hopefully, this is a first good step towards publishing something on voter identification. I look forward to your suggestions for next steps.

EAC Report on Voter Identification

Executive Summary

The Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA) authorizes the United States Election Assistance Commission (EAC) to conduct periodic studies of election administration issues. HAVA Section 303 (b) mandates that first time voters who register by mail are required to show proof of identity before being allowed to cast a ballot. The law prescribes certain requirements concerning this section, but also leaves considerable discretion to the States for its implementation. The EAC sought to examine how these voter identification requirements were implemented in the 2004 general elections and to prepare guidance for the states on this topic.

In May 2005 EAC entered into a contract with the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers, the State University of New Jersey and the Moritz College of Law at the Ohio State University to perform a review and legal analysis of state legislation, administrative procedures and court cases, and to perform a literature review on other research and data available on the topic of voter identification requirements. Further, the contractor was to analyze the problems and challenges of voter identification, to hypothesize alternative approaches and recommend various policies that could be applied to these approaches.

The contractor also performed a statistical analysis of the relationship of various requirements for voter identification to voter turnout in the 2004 election. Using two sets of data, aggregate turnout data at the county level for each state, and reports of individual voters collected in the November 2004 Current Population Survey conducted by the U.S. Census Bureau, the contractor found the overall relationship between the stringency of ID requirements and turnout to be fairly small, but statistically significant.

Based on The Eagleton Institute year-long inquiry into voter identification requirements EAC will implement one or more of the following recommendations:

- Further research into the connection between voter ID requirements and the number of ballots cast and counted;
- A state-by-state review of the impact that voter ID requirements are having on voter's participation;
- A state-by-state review of the relationship between ballot access and ballot security and the number of voters whose ballot is counted;
- A state-by-state review of time periods between voters casting of provisional ballots and the time allowed to return with an ID as well as a review of acceptable forms of identification other than photo ID.

Introduction

This study was conducted at a time in which considerable attention is being paid to the issue of voter identification. Proponents of stricter identification requirements base their case on improving the security of the ballot by reducing opportunities for multiple voting or voting by those who are not eligible. The goal is to ensure that only those legally entitled to vote do so, and do so only once at each election. Opponents of stricter ID requirements seek to ensure board access to a regular ballot. There is a fear that some voters -- racial and ethnic minorities, young and elderly voters-- lack convenient access to required ID documents, or that these voters may be fearful of submitting their ID documents for official scrutiny.

This report considers policy issues associated with the voter ID debate. It examines the relationships between voter ID requirements and voter turnout along with the various policy implications of the issue.

Methodology of the Study

In May 2005, under contract with the EAC, the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers, the State University of New Jersey, and the Moritz College of Law at the Ohio State University undertook a review and legal analysis of state statutes, regulations and litigation concerning voter identification and provisional voting as well as a statistical analysis of the relationship of various requirements for voter identification to turnout in the 2004 election. The contract also included research and study related to provisional voting requirements. These research findings were submitted and reviewed by the EAC as a separate study.

The Eagleton Institute of Politics gathered information on the voter identification requirements in 50 states and the District of Columbia for 2004. Based on interpretations of state statutes and supplemental information provided through conversations with state election officials, state ID requirements were divided into five categories, with each category of identification more rigorous than the one preceding: stating name, signing name, signature match, presenting an ID, and the most rigorous, presenting a government photo ID. The Eagleton Institute also categorized and identified each state according to maximum and minimum identification requirements. Maximum requirements refer to the most that voters may be asked to do or show at the polling place. Minimum requirements refer to the most that voters can be required to do or show in order to cast a regular ballot. These definitions and the subsequent state-by-state analysis of voter identification requirements omitted those cases in which a particular voter's eligibility might be questioned using a state's voter ballot challenge process.

Two data sets were used to apply the criteria (variables) that were developed above: aggregate voter turnout data at the county level which was gathered from the EAC's 2004 Election Day Survey and; reports of individual voters collected through the November 2004 Current Population Survey administered by the U.S. Census Bureau. Use of EAC survey data and Census Bureau CPS data provided a way to cross-check the validity of the analysis and conclusions that would be drawn regarding the effect of voter ID requirements on voter turnout.

Study Oversight and Methodological Review

A draft of the Eagleton Institute report and findings on voter identification requirements was critiqued by a peer review group convened by the Eagleton Institute. A second review of the study's research and statistical methodologies was conducted using a group of research and statistical experts independently convened by the EAC. Comments and insights of the peer review group members were taken into account in the drafting of a study report although there was not unanimous agreement among the individual reviewers regarding the study findings and recommendations.

Summary of the Research

Maximum and Minimum Voter Identification Requirements

In order to analyze what, if any, correlation may exist between a State's voter identification requirements and voter turnout, the Eagleton Institute first coded a state according to how demanding its voter ID requirement was. The voter ID requirement, ranked from lowest to highest was as follows: stating one's name, signing one's name, matching one's signature to a signature on file, providing a form of identification and, providing a form of photo identification. Several possible caveats to this ranking system were noted. For all states which had photo identification requirements in 2004, voters without a photo ID were permitted to cast a regular ballot after signing an affidavit regarding his or her identity and eligibility. These voters were also allowed to provide other forms of ID. The researchers also noted that while each state may be assigned to a category, that categorization may not reflect the actual practice related to voter identification that may or may not have taken place at many polling places.

Research performed for this study by the Moritz College of Law found that states had five different types of maximum identification requirements in place on Election Day 2004. For the purposes of this study a requirement that called for a signed affidavit or the provision of other forms of ID was considered the most rigorous or the “maximum” requirement. At the polling place voters were asked to:

- State his or her name (10 states)
- Sign his or her name (13 states and the District of Columbia)
- Sign his or her name, which would be matched to a signature on file (seven states)
- Provide a form of identification that did not necessarily include a photo (15 states)
- Provide a photo identification (five states)

Using the same criteria, but applying them as minimum rather than maximum criteria for voting the research showed: (check this section- it doesn't really make sense)

- State his or her name (12 states)
- Sign his or her name (14 states and the District of Columbia)
- Matching the voter's signature to the signature on file (6 states)
- Provide a non-photo identification (14 states)
- Swear by an affidavit (4 states)

The results of the research are summarized in Table 1.

Election laws in several states offer exceptions to these ID requirements if potential voters lack the necessary form of identification. Laws in these states set a minimum requirement that a voter may be required to satisfy in order to vote using a regular ballot. In 2004 none of the states required photo identification as a minimum standard for voting with a regular ballot. That is, voters who lacked photo ID were allowed to vote in all states, if he or she was able to meet another ID requirement.

The Relationship of Voter Identification Requirements to Voter Turnout

A statistical analysis examining the variation in turnout rates based on the type of voter ID required by each state in the 2004 election was conducted using two sets of data: 1) aggregate turnout data at the county level for each state (compiled by the Eagleton Institute of Politics-footnote about how they collected the data) and 2) individual level survey data included in the November 2004 Current Population Survey (CPS), conducted by the U.S. Census Bureau.

The analysis looked at the voter identification requirements as a continuous variable and as a series of discrete variables. As a continuous variable the maximum voter identification requirements were ranked according to how demanding they were judged to be, with photo identification considered to be the most demanding requirement (what about affidavit????). Used as discrete variable, the statistical analysis considered stating the name as the least demanding ID requirement; the other ID requirements were then compared to that requirement.

Aggregate-level statistical analysis

The statistical analysis performed by the Eagleton Institute of Politics found that when averaging across counties in each state, statewide turnout is negatively correlated to maximum voter identification requirements ( $r = -.30$ ,  $p$  less than .05). When a statistical analysis is performed on the other minimum voter ID requirements (with affidavit being the most demanding requirement), the correlation between voter identification and turnout is negative, but not statistically significant ( $r = -.20$ ,  $p = .16$ ). These findings would suggest that the relationship between turnout rates and minimum requirements may not be linear.

The aggregate data show that 60.9 percent of the estimated citizen voting age population voted in 2004. Taking into account the maximum requirements, an average of 64.6 percent of the voting age population turned out in states that required voters to state their names, compared to 58.1 percent in states that required photo identification. A similar trend was found when analyzing minimum ID requirements. Sixty-three percent of the voting age population turned out in states requiring voters to state their name, compared to 60.1 percent in states that required an affidavit from voters. This analysis showed there was not a clear, consistent linear relationship between turnout and minimum identification requirements.

(insert table 2- Variation in 2004 State Turnout Based on Voter Identification Requirements)

Multivariate models of analysis using aggregate-level data

The Eagleton Institute of Politics performed an additional analysis that would estimate the effects of voter identification requirements, that took into account the electoral context in 2004 and, the demographic characteristics of the population in each county. The model also considers such variables as whether or not the county was 1) in a presidential battleground state, 2) if the county was in a state with a competitive race for government and/or the U.S. Senate, 3) the percentage of voting-age population in each county that was Hispanic or African-American 4) the percentage of county residents age 65 and older, 5) the percent of county residents below the poverty line, and 6) the number of days between each state's registration deadline and the election.

The results of this statistical modeling and subsequent analysis indicated that the stricter voter ID requirements of matching a voter's signature to a signature on file or with presenting a non-photo identification are associated with lower voter turnout when compared to voter turnout in states that required voters to simply state his or her name. These conclusions were reached when variables 1-5 listed above were held constant.

Other results from the Eagleton Institute analysis of stricter voter identification requirements showed that:

- Increased voter turnout was associated with whether the county was in a battleground state or whether that state have a competitive race for governor and/or U.S.Senate.
- A slight negative effect on turnout was correlated with those state's with a longer time between the closing date for registration and the election.
- Voter turnout declined as the percentage of Hispanics in a county's population increased.
- Higher turnout (and a positive correlation) was associated with a higher percentage of senior citizens and household median income.
- The percentage of African-Americans in the county did not have a significant effect on turnout.

The Eagleton Institute analysis of minimum voter identification requirements showed that:

- A relationship between minimum voter ID requirements and turnout was not demonstrated.
- Battleground states and those with competitive state races had a significant and positive correlation to turnout.
- A higher percentage of senior citizens in the county and higher household median income were associated with higher turnout and showed a positive correlation to turnout.
- The percentage of Hispanics in the county was associated with reduced turnout.
- The increased number of days between the closing date for registration was associated with reduced turnout.

The analysis of these aggregate, county-level data showed a significant correlation, between maximum voter identification requirements (a signature match and non-photo identification, but not a photo identification) and lower turnout in the 2004 election. This correlation was also significant when compared to the minimum voter ID requirement of the voter simply having to state his or her name.

Multivariate analysis using individual level turnout data

This analysis which used November 2004 Current Population Survey data conducted by the U.S. Census Bureau is based on reports from self-described registered voters. Not included in the analysis are persons who said they are not registered to vote, those who said they cast absentee ballots and those who said they were not U.S. citizens. The CPS' Voting and Registration Supplement consisted of interviews, either by telephone or in person, with 96,452 respondents. ( why is the N is Table 3-54,973?)

In addition to the five maximum voter identification requirements (enumerated on page XX) the analysis performed included other socioeconomic, demographic and political factors that could have influenced turnout in the 2004 election. These independent variables were analyzed against the dependent variable of whether or not the respondent said he or she voted in the November 2004 election.

In this analysis three of the voter identification requirements were shown to have a statistically significant correlation with whether or not the survey respondents said they have voted in 2004. Lower voter turnout was associated with:

- those states with maximum voter requirements to sign one's name,
- those states with maximum voter requirements to provide a non-photo ID or photo ID, or
- those states with the minimum voter requirement to swear by an affidavit in order to cast a ballot without the state-required identification

Increased voter turnout showed:

- A significant correlation with the competitiveness of the Presidential race (explain).
- African-American voters were more likely than white or other voters to say they have voted.
- Income and marital status were positive predictors of voting (high income or low income, single, married?),
- Women were more likely to say they voted than men.
- Those ages 45 to 64 and 65 and older were more likely to say they voted than those ages 18 to 24.
- Those who earned a high school diploma, attended some college, graduated from college or attended graduate school were more likely to say they have voted than those who had not finished high school.

Analysis of the predicted probability of voter turnout using the individual data

Using this Census Bureau Current Population Survey data the Eagleton Institute of Politics performed an additional statistical analysis in which they calculated the effect of various independent variables on the probability that a respondent said he or she voted. This analysis, involving 54,973 voters cross-tabulated the maximum and minimum voter identification requirements in each state with the five levels of voting requirements: stating name, signing name, matching the signature, a non-photo ID, photo-ID signing an affidavit. The results of these Predicted Probability of Voter Turnout for all Voter tabulations are summarized in Table 3 below:

From this analysis, the Eagleton Institute of Politics found that three of the voter identification requirements (which ones?) exerted a statistically significant, negative effect on whether or not the CPS survey respondents said they had voted in 2004. That is, compared to states that require voters to only state their name, those states which require the voter to sign his or her name, to provide a non-photo ID, or to provide a photo ID as a maximum requirement, were shown to have a negative influence on turnout. Also, a negative influence on turnout was found when comparing those states that require voters to only state their name, as compared to those states which have as a minimum requirement for verifying voter ID, signing an affidavit.

This probability analysis also found that the competitiveness of the presidential race had a significant effect on turnout as well as some significant demographic and educational effects. For the entire voting population signature, non-photo identification and photo identification requirements were all associated with lower turnout rates compared to the requirements that voter simply state their names. The analysis further found that:

- The predicted probability that Hispanics would vote in states that required non-photo identification was about 10 percentage points lower than in states where Hispanic voters gave their names and that Hispanic voters were less likely to vote in states that required non-photo identification as opposed to only having to state one's name.
- Hispanic voters were 10 percent less likely to vote in non-photo identification states compared to states where voters only had to give their name. African American and Asian-American voters were about 6 percent less likely, while white voters were about 2 percent less likely.
- Asian-American voters were 8.5 percent less likely to vote in states that required non-photo identification compared to states that require voters to state their names under the maximum requirements, while they were 6.1 percent less likely to vote where non-photo identification was the minimum requirement.

- For those with less than a high school diploma, the probability of voting was 5.1 percent lower in states that required photo identification as the maximum requirement and 7 percent lower in those states that required an affidavit as the minimum requirement. These percentages were arrived at when comparing these states to ones that use as a minimum or maximum requirement, the voter to merely state his or her name.

Conclusions from the statistical analysis

The statistical analysis found that as voter identification requirements vary, so do voter turnout rates. These findings were borne out through analyses conducted on aggregate data and individual-level data. There were, however, some distinctions found depending upon whether or not the state's particular voter identification requirements were set as minimums or maximums.

- The overall relationship between voter identification requirements and turnout for all registered voters was found to be small but statistically significant.
- Using the aggregate data the signature match and the non-photo identification requirement correlated with lower turnout. The photo identification requirement did not have a statistically significant effect.
- In the individual-level data the signature, no-photo identification and photo identification requirement were all correlated with lower turnout when compared to the requirements that voter simply state their names.
- Across various demographic groups (African-Americans, Asian-Americans and Hispanics) a statistically significant relationship was found between the non-photo identification requirement and voter turnout

Caveats to the Analysis

The Eagleton Institute for Politics and the EAC make note that while this analysis is a good beginning, significant questions remain regarding the relationship between voter identification requirements and turnout. These analyses are unable, for example, to capture how or why identification requirements might lower turnout. That is, is it because voters are aware of the identification requirements and stay away from the polls because of them? Alternatively, do the requirements result in some voters being turned away when they cannot provide the identification, or must cast a provisional ballot?

Knowing more about the “on the ground” experience of voters regarding various identification requirements will guide state and local level policy makers in their efforts to educate voters about the requirements. These experiences could also help instruct election judges on how to handle questions and possible disputes over voter identification requirements.

Public Policy and Administrative Considerations

Voter Identification, often described as the critical step in protecting the integrity of the ballot, is a process which can ensure that the potential voter is eligible and, if eligible, is permitted to cast one ballot. A voting system that requires voters to produce an identification document or documents may prevent the ineligible from voting, but also may prevent the eligible from casting a ballot.

Evaluating the effect of different voter identification regimes can be most effective when based on clear legal, equitable and practical standards. The questions outlined below might point policymakers to standards that can be created around voter identification requirements.

1. Is the voter ID system designed on the basis of valid and reliable empirical studies the will address concerns regarding certain types of voting fraud?
2. Does the voter ID requirement comply with the letter and spirit of the Voting Rights Act?
3. How effective is the voter ID requirement on increasing the security of the ballot and can it be coordinated with the statewide voter registration database?
4. How feasible is the voter identification requirement? That is, are there administrative or budgetary considerations or concerns? How easy or difficult will it be for pollworkers who must administer the requirement?
5. How cost effective is the voter ID system? That is, what are the monetary and non-monetary costs to the voter and to the state for implementing the ID system?
6. If voter ID requirements are shown to reduce voter turnout (generally, or with some particular groups), what possible steps should be taken to ameliorate this problem?

Recommendations and Next Steps

As the Federal agency charged with informing election officials and the public about various issues related to the administration of elections EAC believes it should, in its capacity as a supporter of elections research, undertake additional study into the topic of voter identification requirements and the implementation of them in the following ways:

- Longitudinal studies of jurisdictions that have changed voter identification requirements.

- State-by-state and precinct-level analyses that will examine the correlations between various voter identification requirements and voter registration and turnout
- Alternative forms and methods for verifying a voter's identity.
- Continuing research into the connection between various voter identification requirements and the number of ballots cast and counted
- A continuing state-by-state update on changes to voter identification requirements.
- Continued collection of state-by-state data which will help examine the impact that voter identification requirements are having on the number of voters who are casting provisional ballots because of voter identification verification issues.

Introduction

Charge Under HAVA

Under the Help America Vote Act, Pub. L. No. 107-252, 116 Stat. 1666 (2002) (“HAVA”), the United States Election Assistance Commission is charged with developing national statistics on voter fraud and developing methods of deterring and investigating voter fraud. Also, the Commission is charged with developing methods of identifying, deterring, and investigating methods of voter intimidation.

Scope of Project

The Commission employed a bipartisan team of legal consultants, Tova Wang and Job Serebrov to develop a preliminary overview work product to determine the quantity and quality of vote fraud and voter intimidation that is present on a national scale. The consultants’ work is neither comprehensive nor conclusive. This first phase of an envisioned two-phase project was constrained by both time and funding. The consultants’ conclusions and recommendations for phase II will be contained in this report.

The consultants, working without the aid of a support staff, divided most of the work. However, the final work product was mutually checked and approved. They agreed upon the steps that were taken needed and the method employed. For all of the documentary sources, the consultants limited the time period under review from January 1, 2001 to January 1, 2006. The research performed by the consultants included interviews, an extensive Nexis search, a review of existing literature, and case research.

Interviews: The consultants chose the interviewees by first coming up with a list of the categories of types of people they wanted to interview. Then the consultants separately, equally filled those categories with a certain number of people. Due to time and resource constraints, the consultants had to pare down this list substantially – for instance, they had to rule out interviewing prosecutors altogether – but still got a good range of people to talk to. The ultimate categories were academics, advocates, elections officials, lawyers and judges. Although the consultants were able to talk to most of the people they wanted to, some were unavailable and a few were not comfortable speaking to them, particularly judges. The consultants together conducted all of the interviews, either by phone or in person. Then the consultants split up drafting the summaries. All summaries were reviewed and mutually approved. Most of the interviews were extremely informative and the consultants found the interviewees to be extremely knowledgeable and insightful for the most part.

Nexis: Initially, the consultants developed an enormous list of possible Nexis search terms. It soon became obvious that it would be impossible to conduct the research that way. As a result, consultant Wang performed the Nexis search by finding search term combinations that would yield virtually every article on a particular subject from the last five years. Consultant Serebrov approved the search terms. Then Wang created an excel spreadsheet in order to break down the articles in way in which they could be effectively analyzed for patterns. Each type of fraud is broken down in a separate chart according to where it took place, the date, the type of election it occurred in, what the allegation was, the publication it came from. Where there was a follow up article, any information that that suggested there had been some further action taken or some resolution to the allegation was also included. For four very complicated and long drawn out situations – Washington State, Wisconsin, South Dakota in 2004, and the vote buying cases in a couple of particular jurisdictions over the last several years –written summaries with news citations are provided.

Existing Literature: Part of the selections made by the consultants resulted from consultant Wang's long-term familiarity with the material while part was the result of a joint web search for articles and books on vote fraud and voter intimidation and suggestions from those interviewed by the consultants. The consultants reviewed a wide range of materials from government reports and investigations, to academic literature, to reports published by advocacy groups. The consultants believe that they covered the landscape of available sources.

Cases: In order to properly identify all applicable cases, the consultants first developed an extensive word search term list. A WestLaw search was performed and the first one hundred cases under each word search term were then gathered in individual files. This resulted in a total of approximately 44,000 cases. Most of these cases were federal as opposed to state and appellate as opposed to trial. Consultant Serebrov analyzed the cases in each file to determine if they were on point. If he found that the first twenty cases were inapplicable, Serebrov would sample forty to fifty other file cases at random to determine applicability. If the entire file did not yield any cases, the file would be discarded. All discarded word search terms were recorded in a separate file. Likewise, if the file only yielded a few applicable cases, it would also be discarded. However, if a small but significant number of cases were on point, the file was later charted. The results of the case search were stark because relatively few applicable cases were found.

Working Definition of Fraud and Intimidation

Note: The definition provided below is for the purposes of this EAC project. Most of the acts described come within the federal criminal definition of fraud, but some may not.

Election fraud is any intentional action, or intentional failure to act when there is a duty to do so, that corrupts the election process in a manner that can impact on election outcomes. This includes interfering in the process by which persons register to vote; the way in which ballots are obtained, marked, or tabulated; and the process by which election results are canvassed and certified.

Examples include the following:

- falsifying voter registration information pertinent to eligibility to cast a vote, (e.g. residence, criminal status, etc).;
- altering completed voter registration applications by entering false information;
- knowingly destroying completed voter registration applications (other than spoiled applications) before they can be submitted to the proper election authority;
- knowingly removing eligible voters from voter registration lists, in violation of HAVA, NVRA, or state election laws;
- intentional destruction by election officials of voter registration records or balloting records, in violation of records retention laws, to remove evidence of election fraud;
- vote buying;
- voting in the name of another;
- voting more than once;
- coercing a voter's choice on an absentee ballot;
- using a false name and/or signature on an absentee ballot;
- destroying or misappropriating an absentee ballot;
- felons, or in some states ex-felons, who vote when they know they are ineligible to do so;
- misleading an ex-felon about his or her right to vote;
- voting by non-citizens who know they are ineligible to do so;
- intimidating practices aimed at vote suppression or deterrence, including the abuse of challenge laws;
- deceiving voters with false information (e.g.; deliberately directing voters to the wrong polling place or providing false information on polling hours and dates);
- knowingly failing to accept voter registration applications, to provide ballots, or to accept and count voted ballots in accordance with the Uniformed and Overseas Citizens Absentee Voting Act;
- intentional miscounting of ballots by election officials;
- intentional misrepresentation of vote tallies by election officials;
- acting in any other manner with the intention of suppressing voter registration or voting, or interfering with vote counting and the certification of the vote.

Voting Fraud and Voter Intimidation – Preliminary Research & Recommendations

Voting fraud does not include mistakes made in the course of voter registration, balloting, or tabulating ballots and certifying results. For purposes of the EAC study, it also does not include violations of campaign finance laws.

Summaries of Research Conducted

Common Themes

- There is virtually universal agreement that absentee ballot fraud is the biggest problem, with vote buying and registration fraud coming in after that. The vote buying often comes in the form of payment for absentee ballots, although not always. Some absentee ballot fraud is part of an organized effort; some is by individuals, who sometimes are not even aware that what they are doing is illegal. Voter registration fraud seems to take the form of people signing up with false names. Registration fraud seems to be most common where people doing the registration were paid by the signature.
- There is widespread but not unanimous agreement that there is little polling place fraud, or at least much less than is claimed, including voter impersonation, “dead” voters, noncitizen voting and felon voters. Those few who believe it occurs often enough to be a concern say that it is impossible to show the extent to which it happens, but do point to instances in the press of such incidents. Most people believe that false registration forms have not resulted in polling place fraud, although it may create the perception that vote fraud is possible. Those who believe there is more polling place fraud than reported/investigated/prosecuted believe that registration fraud does lead to fraudulent votes. Jason Torchinsky from the American Center for Voting Rights is the only interviewee who believes that polling place fraud is widespread and among the most significant problems in the system.
- Abuse of challenger laws and abusive challengers seem to be the biggest intimidation/suppression concerns, and many of those interviewed assert that the new identification requirements are the modern version of voter intimidation and suppression. However there is evidence of some continued outright intimidation and suppression, especially in some Native American communities. A number of people also raise the problem of poll workers engaging in harassment of minority voters. Other activities commonly raised were the issue of polling places being moved at the last moment, unequal distribution of voting machines, videotaping of voters at the polls, and targeted misinformation campaigns.
- Several people indicate – including representatives from DOJ -- that for various reasons, the Department of Justice is bringing fewer voter intimidation and suppression cases now and is focusing on matters such as noncitizen voting, double voting and felon voting. While the civil rights section continues to focus on systemic patterns of malfeasance, the public integrity section is focusing now on individuals, on isolated instances of fraud.
- The problem of badly kept voter registration lists, with both ineligible voters remaining on the rolls and eligible voters being taken off, remains a common concern. A few people are also troubled by voters being on registration lists in two states. They said that there was no evidence that this had led to double voting, but it opens the door to the possibility. There is great hope that full implementation of the new requirements of HAVA – done well, a major caveat – will reduce this problem dramatically.

Common Recommendations:

- Many of those interviewed recommend better poll worker training as the best way to improve the process; a few also recommended longer voting times or voting on days other than election day (such as weekends) but fewer polling places so only the best poll workers would be employed
- Many interviewed support stronger criminal laws and increased enforcement of existing laws with respect to both fraud and intimidation. Advocates from across the spectrum expressed frustration with the failure of the Department of Justice to pursue complaints.
  - With respect to the civil rights section, John Tanner indicated that fewer cases are being brought because fewer are warranted – it has become increasingly difficult to know when allegations of intimidation and suppression are credible since it depends on one's definition of intimidation, and because both parties are doing it. Moreover prior enforcement of the laws has now changed the entire landscape – race based problems are rare now. Although challenges based on race and unequal implementation of identification rules would be actionable, Mr. Tanner was unaware of such situations actually occurring and the section has not pursued any such cases.
  - Craig Donsanto of the public integrity section says that while the number of election fraud related complaints have not gone up since 2002, nor has the proportion of legitimate to illegitimate claims of fraud, the number of cases the department is investigating and the number of indictments the section is pursuing are both up dramatically. Since 2002, the department has brought more cases against alien voters, felon voters and double voters than ever before. Mr. Donsanto would like more resources so it can do more and would like to have laws that make it easier for the federal government to assume jurisdiction over voter fraud cases.
- A couple of interviewees recommend a new law that would make it easier to criminally prosecute people for intimidation even when there is not racial animus.
- Almost everyone hopes that administrators will maximize the potential of statewide voter registration databases to prevent fraud. Of particular note, Sarah Ball Johnson, Executive Director of Elections for Kentucky, emphasized that having had an effective statewide voter registration database for more than thirty years has helped that state avoid most of the fraud problems that have been alleged elsewhere, such as double voting and felon voting.
- Several advocate expanded monitoring of the polls, including some associated with the Department of Justice.
- Challenge laws, both with respect to pre-election day challenges and challengers at the polls, need to be revised by all states to ensure they are not used for purposes of wrongful disenfranchisement and harassment

- Several people advocate passage of Senator Barak Obama's "deceptive practices" bill
- There is a split on whether it would be helpful to have nonpartisan election officials – some indicated they thought even if elections officials are elected nonpartisanly they will carry out their duties in biased ways nonetheless. However, most agree that elections officials pursuing partisan agendas is a problem that must be addressed in some fashion. Suggestions included moving election responsibilities out of the secretary of states' office; increasing transparency in the process; and enacting conflict of interest rules.
- A few recommend returning to allowing use of absentee ballots "for cause" only if it were politically feasible.
- A few recommend enacting a national identification card, including Pat Rogers, an attorney in New Mexico, and Jason Torchinsky from ACVR, who advocates the scheme contemplated in the Carter-Baker Commission Report.
- A couple of interviewees indicated the need for clear standards for the distribution of voting machines

Nexis Research

Absentee Ballot Fraud

According to press reports, absentee ballots are abused in a variety of ways:

- Campaign workers, candidates and others coerce the voting choices of vulnerable populations, usually elderly voters
- Workers for groups and individuals have attempted to vote absentee in the names of the deceased
- Workers for groups, campaign workers and individuals have attempted to forge the names of other voters on absentee ballot requests and absentee ballots and thus vote multiple times

It is unclear how often actual convictions result from these activities (a handful of articles indicate convictions and guilty pleas), but this is an area in which there have been a substantial number of official investigations and actual charges filed, according to news reports where such information is available. A few of the allegations became part of civil court proceedings contesting the outcome of the election.

While absentee fraud allegations turn up throughout the country, a few states have had several such cases. Especially of note are Indiana, New Jersey, South Dakota, and most particularly, Texas. Interestingly, there were no articles regarding Oregon, where the entire system is vote by mail.

Voter Registration Fraud

According to press reports, the following types of allegations of voter registration fraud are most common:

- Registering in the name of dead people
- Fake names and other information on voter registration forms
- Illegitimate addresses used on voter registration forms
- Voters being tricked into registering for a particular party under false pretenses
- Destruction of voter registration forms depending on the party the voter registered with

There was only one self evident instance of a noncitizen registering to vote. Many of the instances reported on included official investigations and charges filed, but few actual convictions, at least from the news reporting. There have been multiple reports of registration fraud in California, Colorado, Florida, Missouri, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, South Dakota and Wisconsin.

Voter Intimidation and Suppression

This is the area which had the most articles in part because there were so many allegations of intimidation and suppression during the 2004 election. Most of these remained allegations and no criminal investigation or prosecution ensued. Some of the cases did end up in civil litigation.

This is not to say that these alleged activities were confined to 2004 – there were several allegations made during every year studied. Most notable were the high number of allegations of voter intimidation and harassment reported during the 2003 Philadelphia mayoral race.

A very high number of the articles were about the issue of challenges to voters' registration status and challengers at the polling places. There were many allegations that planned challenge activities were targeted at minority communities. Some of the challenges were concentrated in immigrant communities.

However, the tactics alleged varied greatly. The types of activities discussed also include the following:

- Photographing or videotaping voters coming out of polling places.
- Improper demands for identification
- Poll watchers harassing voters
- Poll workers being hostile to or aggressively challenging voters
- Disproportionate police presence
- Poll watchers wearing clothes with messages that seemed intended to intimidate
- Insufficient voting machines and unmanageably long lines

Although the incidents reported on occurred everywhere, not surprisingly, many came from “battleground” states. There were several such reports out of Florida, Ohio and Pennsylvania.

“Dead Voters and Multiple Voting”

There were a high number of articles about people voting in the names of the dead and voting more than once. Many of these articles were marked by allegations of big numbers of people committing these frauds, and relatively few of these allegations turning out to be accurate according to investigations by the newspapers themselves, elections officials and criminal investigators. Often the problem turned out to be a result of administrative error, poll workers mis-marking of voter lists, a flawed registration list and/or errors made in the attempt to match names of voters on the list with the names of the people who voted. In a good number of cases, there were allegations that charges of double voting by political leaders were an effort to scare people away from the voting process.

Nonetheless there were a few cases of people actually being charged and/or convicted for these kinds of activities. Most of the cases involved a person voting both by absentee ballot and in person. A few instances involved people voting both during early voting and on Election Day, which calls into question the proper marking and maintenance of the voting lists. In many instances, the person charged claimed not to have voted twice on purpose. A very small handful of cases involved a voter voting in more than one county and there was one substantiated case involving a person voting in more than one state. Other instances in which such efforts were alleged were disproved by officials.

In the case of voting in the name of a dead person, the problem lay in the voter registration list not being properly maintained, i.e. the person was still on the registration list as eligible to vote, and a person taking criminal advantage of that. In total, the San Francisco Chronicle found 5 such cases in March 2004; the AP cited a newspaper analysis of five such persons in an Indiana primary in May 2004; and a senate committee found two people to have voted in the names of the dead in 2005.

As usual, there were a disproportionate number of such articles coming out of Florida. Notably, there were three articles out of Oregon, which has one hundred percent vote-by-mail.

Vote Buying

There were a surprising number of articles about vote buying cases. A few of these instances involved long-time investigations in three particular jurisdictions as detailed in the vote buying summary. There were more official investigations, indictments and convictions/pleas in this area. All of these cases are concentrated in the Midwest and South.

Deceptive Practices

006533

In 2004 there were numerous reports of intentional disinformation about voting eligibility and the voting process meant to confuse voters about their rights and when and where to vote. Misinformation came in the form of flyers, phone calls, letters, and even people going door to door. Many of the efforts were reportedly targeted at minority communities. A disproportionate number of them came from key battleground states, particularly Florida, Ohio, and Pennsylvania. From the news reports found, only one of these instances was officially investigated, the case in Oregon involving the destruction of voter registration forms. There were no reports of prosecutions or any other legal proceeding.

Non-citizen Voting

There were surprisingly few articles regarding noncitizen registration and voting – just seven all together, in seven different states across the country. They were also evenly split between allegations of noncitizens registering and noncitizens voting. In one case charges were filed against ten individuals. In one case a judge in a civil suit found there was illegal noncitizen voting. Three instances prompted official investigations. Two cases, from this nexis search, remained just allegations of noncitizen voting.

Felon Voting

Although there were only thirteen cases of felon voting, some of them involved large numbers of voters. Most notably, of course, are the cases that came to light in the Washington gubernatorial election contest (see Washington summary) and in Wisconsin (see Wisconsin summary). In several states, the main problem has been the large number of ineligible felons that remained on the voting list.

Election Official Fraud

In most of the cases in which fraud by elections officials is suspected or alleged, it is difficult to determine whether it is incompetence or a crime. There are several cases of ballots gone missing, ballots unaccounted for and ballots ending up in a worker's possession. In two cases workers were said to have changed peoples' votes. The one instance in which widespread ballot box stuffing by elections workers was alleged was in Washington State. The judge in the civil trial of that election contest did not find that elections workers had committed fraud. Four of the cases are from Texas.

Existing Research

There are many reports and books that describe anecdotes and draw broad conclusions from a large array of incidents. There is little research that is truly systematic or scientific. The most systematic look at fraud is the report written by Lori Minnite. The most systematic look at voter intimidation is the report by Laughlin McDonald. Books written about this subject seem to all have a political bias and a pre-existing agenda that makes them somewhat less valuable.

Researchers agree that measuring something like the incidence of fraud and intimidation in a scientifically legitimate way is extremely difficult from a methodological perspective and would require resources beyond the means of most social and political scientists. As a result, there is much more written on this topic by advocacy groups than social scientists. It is hoped that this gap will be filled in the “second phase” of this EAC project.

Moreover, reports and books make allegations but, perhaps by their nature, have little follow up. As a result, it is difficult to know when something has remained in the stage of being an allegation and gone no further, or progressed to the point of being investigated or prosecuted or in any other way proven to be valid by an independent, neutral entity. This is true, for example, with respect to allegations of voter intimidation by civil rights organizations, and, with respect to fraud, John Fund’s frequently cited book. Again, this is something that it is hoped will be addressed in the “second phase” of this EAC project by doing follow up research on allegations made in reports, books and newspaper articles.

Other items of note:

- There is as much evidence, and as much concern, about structural forms of disenfranchisement as about intentional abuse of the system. These include felon disenfranchisement, poor maintenance of databases and identification requirements.
- There is tremendous disagreement about the extent to which polling place fraud, e.g. double voting, intentional felon voting, noncitizen voting, is a serious problem. On balance, more researchers find it to be less of a problem than is commonly described in the political debate, but some reports say it is a major problem, albeit hard to identify.
- There is substantial concern across the board about absentee balloting and the opportunity it presents for fraud.
- Federal law governing election fraud and intimidation is varied and complex and yet may nonetheless be insufficient or subject to too many limitations to be as effective as it might be.
- Deceptive practices, e.g. targeted flyers and phone calls providing misinformation, were a major problem in 2004.
- Voter intimidation continues to be focused on minority communities, although the American Center for Voting Rights uniquely alleges it is focused on Republicans.

Cases

After reviewing over 40,000 cases, the majority of which came from appeals courts, I have found comparatively very few which are applicable to this study. Of those that are applicable, no apparent thematic pattern emerges. However, it seems that the greatest areas of fraud and intimidation have shifted from past patterns of stealing votes to present problems with voter registration, voter identification, the proper delivery and counting of absentee and overseas ballots, provisional voting, vote buying, and challenges to felon eligibility. But because so few cases provided a picture of these current problems, I suggest that case research for the second phase of this project concentrate on state trial-level decisions.

Methodology

The following is a summary of interviews conducted with a number of political scientists and experts in the field as to how one might undertake a comprehensive examination of voter fraud and intimidation. A list of the individuals interviewed and their ideas are available, and all of the individuals welcome any further questions or explanations of their recommended procedures.

- In analyzing instances of alleged fraud and intimidation, we should look to criminology as a model. In criminology, experts use two sources: the Uniform Crime Reports, which are all reports made to the police, and the Victimization Survey, which asks the general public whether a particular incident has happened to them. After surveying what the most common allegations are, we should conduct a survey of the general public that ask whether they have committed certain acts or been subjected to any incidents of fraud or intimidation. This would require using a very large sample, and we would need to employ the services of an expert in survey data collection. (Stephen Ansolobehere, MIT)
- Several political scientists with expertise in these types of studies recommended a methodology that includes interviews, focus groups, and a limited survey. In determining who to interview and where the focus groups should be drawn from, they recommend the following procedure:
  - Pick a number of places that have historically had many reports of fraud and/or intimidation; from that pool pick 10 that are geographically and demographically diverse, and have had a diversity of problems
  - Pick a number of places that have not had many reports of fraud and/or intimidation; from that pool pick 10 places that match the geographic and demographic make-up of the previous ten above (and, if possible, have comparable elections practices)

- Assess the resulting overall reports and impressions resulting from these interviews and focus groups, and examine comparisons and differences among the states and what may give rise to them.

In conducting a survey of elections officials, district attorneys, district election officers, they recommend that:

- The survey sample be large in order to be able to get the necessary subsets
- The survey must include a random set of counties where there have and have not been a large number of allegations

(Allan Lichtman, American University; Thad Hall, University of Utah; Bernard Grofman, UC – Irvine)

- Another political scientist recommended employing a methodology that relies on qualitative data drawn from in-depth interviews with key critics and experts on all sides of the debate on fraud; quantitative data collected through a survey of state and local elections and law enforcement officials; and case studies. Case studies should focus on the five or ten states, regions or cities where there has been a history of election fraud to examine past and present problems. The survey should be mailed to each state's attorney general and secretary of state, each county district attorney's office and each county board of elections in the 50 states. (Lorraine Minnite, Barnard College)
- The research should be a two-step process. Using LexisNexis and other research tools, a search should be conducted of news media accounts over the past decade. Second, interviews with a systematic sample of election officials nationwide and in selected states should be conducted. (Chandler Davidson, Rice University)
- One expert in the field posits that we can never come up with a number that accurately represents either the incidence of fraud or the incidence of voter intimidation. Therefore, the better approach is to do an assessment of what is most likely to happen, what election violations are most likely to be committed – in other words, a risk analysis. This would include an analysis of what it would actually take to commit various acts, e.g. the cost/benefit of each kind of violation. From there we could rank the likely prevalence of each type of activity and examine what measures are or could be effective in combating them. (Wendy Weiser, Brennan Center of New York University)
- Replicate a study in the United States done abroad by Susan Hyde of the University of California- San Diego examining the impact of impartial poll site observers on the incidence of election fraud. Doing this retrospectively would require the following steps:
  - Find out where there were federal observers
  - Get precinct level voting information for those places

- Analyze whether there was any difference in election outcomes in those places with and without observers, and whether any of these results seem anomalous.

Despite the tremendous differences in the political landscapes of the countries examined by Hyde in previous studies and the U.S., Hyde believes this study could be effectively replicated in this country by sending observers to a random sample of precincts. Rather than compare the incumbent's vote share, such factors such as voter complaints, voter turnout, number of provisional ballots used, composition of the electorate, as well as any anomalous voting results could be compared between sites with and without monitors.

For example, if intimidation is occurring, and if reputable monitors make intimidation less likely or voters more confident, then turnout should be higher on average in monitored precincts than in unmonitored precincts. If polling station officials are intentionally refusing to issue provisional ballots, and the polling station officials are more likely to adhere to regulations while being monitored, the average number of provisional ballots should be higher in monitored precincts than in unmonitored precincts. If monitors cause polling station officials to adhere more closely to regulations, then there should be fewer complaints (in general) about monitored than unmonitored precincts (this could also be reversed if monitors made voters more likely to complain).

Again, random assignment controls for all of the other factors that otherwise influence these variables.

One of the downsides of this approach is it does not get at some forms of fraud, e.g. absentee ballot fraud; those would have to be analyzed separately.

- Another political scientist recommends conducting an analysis of vote fraud claims and purging of registration rolls by list matching. Allegations of illegal voting often are based on matching of names and birth dates. Alleged instances of double voting are based on matching the names and birth dates of persons found on voting records. Allegations of ineligible felon (depending on state law), deceased, and of non-citizen voting are based on matching lists of names, birth dates, and sometimes addresses of such people against a voting records. Anyone with basic relational database skills can perform such matching in a matter of minutes.

However, there are a number of pitfalls for the unwary that can lead to grossly over-estimating the number of fraudulent votes, such as missing or ignored middle names and suffixes or matching on missing birth dates. Furthermore, there is a surprising statistical fact that a group of about three hundred people with the same first and last name are almost assured to share the exact same birth date, including year. In a large state, it is not uncommon for hundreds of Robert Smiths (and other common names) to have voted. Thus, allegations of vote fraud or purging of voter registration rolls by list matching almost assuredly will find a large proportion of false positives: people who voted legally or are registered to vote legally.

Statistics can be rigorously applied to determine how many names would be expected to be matched by chance. A simulation approach is best applied here: randomly assign a birth date to an arbitrary number of people and observe how many match within the list or across lists. The simulation is repeated many times to average out the variation due to chance. The results can then be matched back to actual voting records and purge lists, for example, in the hotly contested states of Ohio or Florida, or in states with Election Day registration where there are concerns that easy access to voting permits double voting. This analysis will rigorously identify the magnitude alleged voter fraud, and may very well find instances of alleged fraud that exceed what might have otherwise happened by chance.

This same political scientist also recommends another way to examine the problem: look at statistics on provisional voting: the number cast might provide indications of intimidation (people being challenged at the polls) and the number of those not counted would be indications of "vote fraud." One could look at those jurisdictions in the Election Day Survey with a disproportionate number of provisional ballots cast and cross reference it with demographics and number of provisional ballots discarded. (Michael McDonald, George Mason University)

- Spencer Overton, in a forthcoming law review article entitled Voter Identification, suggests a methodology that employs three approaches—investigations of voter fraud, random surveys of voters who purported to vote, and an examination of death rolls provide a better understanding of the frequency of fraud. He says all three approaches have strengths and weaknesses, and thus the best studies would employ all three to assess the extent of voter fraud. An excerpt follows:

1. Investigations and Prosecutions of Voter Fraud

Policymakers should develop databases that record all investigations, allegations, charges, trials, convictions, acquittals, and plea bargains regarding voter fraud. Existing studies are incomplete but provide some insight. For example, a statewide survey of each of Ohio's 88 county boards of elections found only four instances of ineligible persons attempting to vote out of a total of 9,078,728 votes cast in the state's 2002 and 2004 general elections. This is a fraud rate of 0.00000045 percent. The Carter-Baker Commission's Report noted that since October 2002, federal officials had charged 89 individuals with casting multiple votes, providing false information about their felon status, buying votes, submitting false voter registration information, and voting improperly as a non-citizen. Examined in the context of the 196,139,871 ballots cast between October 2002 and

August 2005, this represents a fraud rate of 0.0000005 percent (note also that not all of the activities charged would have been prevented by a photo identification requirement).

A more comprehensive study should distinguish voter fraud that could be prevented by a photo identification requirement from other types of fraud — such as absentee voting and stuffing ballot boxes — and obtain statistics on the factors that led law enforcement to prosecute fraud. The study would demand significant resources because it would require that researchers interview and pour over the records of local district attorneys and election boards.

Hard data on investigations, allegations, charges, pleas, and prosecutions is important because it quantifies the amount of fraud officials detect. Even if prosecutors vigorously pursue voter fraud, however, the number of fraud cases charged probably does not capture the total amount of voter fraud. Information on official investigations, charges, and prosecutions should be supplemented by surveys of voters and a comparison of voting rolls to death rolls.

2. Random Surveys of Voters

Random surveys could give insight about the percentage of votes cast fraudulently. For example, political scientists could contact a statistically representative sampling of 1,000 people who purportedly voted at the polls in the last election, ask them if they actually voted, and confirm the percentage who are valid voters. Researchers should conduct the survey soon after an election to locate as many legitimate voters as possible with fresh memories.

Because many respondents would perceive voting as a social good, some who did not vote might claim that they did, which may underestimate the extent of fraud. A surveyor might mitigate this skew through the framing of the question (“I’ve got a record that you voted. Is that true?”).

Further, some voters will not be located by researchers and others will refuse to talk to researchers. Photo identification proponents might construe these non-respondents as improper registrations that were used to commit voter fraud.

Instead of surveying all voters to determine the amount of fraud, researchers might reduce the margin of error by focusing on a random sampling of voters who signed affidavits in the three states that request photo identification but also allow voters to establish their identity through affidavit—Florida, Louisiana, and South Dakota. In South Dakota, for example, only two percent of voters signed affidavits to establish their identity. If the survey indicates that 95 percent of those who signed affidavits are legitimate voters (and the other 5 percent were shown to be either fraudulent or were non-responsive), this suggests that voter fraud accounts for, at the maximum, 0.1 percent of ballots cast.

The affidavit study, however, is limited to three states, and it is unclear whether this sample is representative of other states (the difficulty may be magnified in Louisiana in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina's displacement of hundreds of thousands of voters). Further, the affidavit study reveals information about the amount of fraud in a photo identification state with an affidavit exception—more voter fraud may exist in a state that does not request photo identification.

3. Examining Death Rolls

A comparison of death rolls to voting rolls might also provide an estimate of fraud.

Imagine that one million people live in state A, which has no documentary identification requirement. Death records show that 20,000 people passed away in state A in 2003. A cross-referencing of this list to the voter rolls shows that 10,000 of those who died were registered voters, and these names remained on the voter rolls during the November 2004 election. Researchers would look at what percentage of the 10,000 dead-but-registered people who "voted" in the November 2004 election. A researcher should distinguish the votes cast in the name of the dead at the polls from those cast absentee (which a photo identification requirement would not prevent). This number would be extrapolated to the electorate as a whole.

This methodology also has its strengths and weaknesses. If fraudulent voters target the dead, the study might overestimate the fraud that exists among living voters (although a low incidence of fraud among deceased voters might suggest that fraud among all voters is low). The appearance of fraud also might be inflated by false positives produced by a computer match of different people with the same name. Photo identification advocates would likely assert that the rate of voter fraud could be higher among fictitious names registered, and that the death record survey would not capture that type of fraud because fictitious names registered would not show up in the death records. Nevertheless, this study, combined with the other two, would provide important insight into the magnitude of fraud likely to exist in the absence of a photo identification requirement.

Recommendations for Further EAC Activity on Voting Fraud and Voter Intimidation

Consultants' Recommendations

Recommendation 1: Conduct More Interviews

Time and resource constraints prevented the consultants from interviewing the full range of participants in the process. As a result, we recommend that any future activity in this area include conducting further interviews.

In particular, we recommend that more election officials from all levels of government, parts of the country, and parties be interviewed. These individuals have the most direct inside information on how the system works -- and at times does not work. They are often the first people voters go to when something goes wrong and are often responsible for fixing it. They are the ones who must carry out the measures that are designed to both prevent fraud and voter intimidation and suppression. They will most likely know what, therefore, is and is not working.

It would also be especially beneficial to talk to people in law enforcement, specifically federal District Election Officers ("DEOs") and local district attorneys, as well as civil and criminal defense attorneys.

The Public Integrity Section of the Criminal Division of the Department of Justice has all of the 93 U.S. Attorneys appoint Assistant U.S. Attorneys to serve as DEOs for two years. DEOs are required to

- screen and conduct preliminary investigations of complaints, in conjunction with the FBI and PIN, to determine whether they constitute potential election crimes and should become matters for investigation;
- oversee the investigation and prosecution of election fraud and other election crimes in their districts;
- coordinate their district's (investigative and prosecutorial) efforts with DOJ headquarters prosecutors;
- coordinate election matters with state and local election and law enforcement officials and make them aware of their availability to assist with election-related matters;
- issue press releases to the public announcing the names and telephone numbers of DOJ and FBI officials to contact on election day with complaints about voting or election irregularities and answer telephones on election day to receive these complaints; and
- supervise a team of Assistant U.S. Attorneys and FBI special agents who are appointed to handle election-related allegations while the polls are open on election day.<sup>i</sup>

Given the great responsibilities of the DEOs, and the breadth of issues they must deal with, they undoubtedly are great resources for information and insight as to what types of fraud and intimidation/suppression are occurring in their districts.

In many situations, however, it is the local district attorneys who will investigate election fraud and suppression tactics, especially in local elections. They will be able to provide information on what has gone on in their jurisdictions, as well as which matters get pursued and why.

Finally, those who defend people accused of election related crimes would also be useful to speak to. They may have a different perspective on how well the system is working to detect, prevent, and prosecute election fraud.

Recommendation 2: Follow Up on Nexis Research

The Nexis search conducted for this phase of the research was based on a list of search terms agreed upon by both consultants. Thousands of articles were reviewed and hundreds analyzed. Many of the articles contain allegations of fraud or intimidation. Similarly, many of the articles contain information about investigations into such activities or even charges brought. However, without being able to go beyond the agreed search terms, it could not be determined whether there was any later determination regarding the allegations, investigation or charges brought. This leaves a gaping hole: it is impossible to know if the article is just reporting on “talk” or what turns out to be a serious affront to the system.

As a result, we recommend that follow up Nexis research be conducted to determine what, if any, resolutions or further activity there was in each case. This would provide a much more accurate picture of what types of activities are actually taking place.

Recommendation 3: Follow Up on Allegations Found in Literature Review

Similarly, many allegations are made in the reports and books that we analyzed and summarized. Those allegations are often not substantiated in any way and are inherently time limited by the date of the writing. Despite this, such reports and books are frequently cited by various interested parties as evidence of fraud or intimidation.

Therefore, we recommend follow up to the literature review: for those reports and books that make or cite specific instances of fraud or intimidation, a research effort should be made to follow up on those references to see if and how they were resolved.

Recommendation 4: Review Complaints File With MyVote1 Project Voter Hotline

During the 2004 election and the statewide elections of 2005, the University of Pennsylvania led a consortium of groups and researchers in conducting the MyVote1 Project. This project involved using a 1-800 voter hotline where voters could call for poll location, be transferred to a local hotline, or leave a recorded message with a complaint.

In 2004, this resulted in over 200,000 calls received and over 56,000 recorded complaints.<sup>ii</sup> The researchers in charge of this project have done a great deal of work to parse and analyze the data collected through this process, including going through the audio messages and categorizing them by the nature of the complaint. These categories include registration, absentee ballot, poll access, ballot/screen, coercion/intimidation, identification, mechanical, provisional (ballot).

We recommend that further research include making full use of this data with the cooperation of the project leaders. While perhaps not a fully scientific survey given the self-selection of the callers, the information regarding 200,000 complaints should provide a good deal of insight into the problems voters experienced, especially those in the nature of intimidation or suppression.

Recommendation 5: Further Review of Complaints Filed With U.S. Department of Justice

Although according to a recent GAO report the Voting Section of the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice has a variety in ways it tracks complaints of voter intimidation,<sup>iii</sup> the Section was extremely reluctant to provide the consultants with useful information. Further attempts should be made to obtain relevant data. This includes the telephone logs of complaints the Section keeps and information from the database – the Interactive Case Management (ICM) system – the Section maintains on complaints received and the corresponding action taken. We also recommend that further research include a review and analysis of the observer and monitor field reports from Election Day that must be filed with the Section.

Recommendation 6: Review Reports Filed By District Election Officers

Similarly, the consultants believe it would be useful for any further research to include a review of the reports that must be filed by every District Election Officer to the Public Integrity Section of the Criminal Division of the Department of Justice. As noted above, the DEOs play a central role in receiving reports of voter fraud and investigating and pursuing them. Their reports back to the Department would likely provide tremendous insight into what actually transpired during the last several elections. Where necessary, information could be redacted or made confidential.

Recommendation 7: Attend Ballot Access and Voting Integrity Symposium

The consultants also believe it would be useful for any further activity in this area to include attendance at the next Ballot Access and Voting Integrity Symposium. According to the Department,<sup>iv</sup>

Prosecutors serving as District Election Officers in the 94 U.S. Attorneys' Offices are required to attend annual training conferences on fighting election fraud and voting rights abuses... These conferences are sponsored by the Voting Section of the Civil Rights Division and the Public Integrity

Section of the Criminal Division, and feature presentations by Civil Rights officials and senior prosecutors from the Public Integrity Section and the U.S. Attorneys' Offices. As a result of these conferences, there is a nationwide increase in Department expertise relating to the prosecution of election crimes and the enforcement of voting rights.

By attending the symposium researchers could learn more about the following:

- How District Election Officers are trained, e.g. what they are taught to focus their resources on, how they are instructed to respond to various types of complaints
- How information about previous election and voting issues is presented
- How the Voting Rights Act, the criminal laws governing election fraud and intimidation, the National Voter Registration Act, and the Help America Vote Act are described and explained to participants

Recommendation 8: Employ Academic or Individual to Conduct Statistical Research

Included in this report is a summary of various methodologies political scientists and others suggested to measure voter fraud and intimidation. While we note the skepticism of the Working Group in this regard, we nonetheless recommend that in order to further the mission of providing unbiased data, further activity in this area include an academic institution and/or individual that focuses on sound, statistical methods for political science research.

Recommendation 9: Explore Improvements to Federal Law

Finally, consultant Tova Wang recommends that future researchers review federal law to explore ways to make it easier to impose either civil or criminal penalties for acts of intimidation that do not necessarily involve racial animus and/or a physical or economic threat.

According to Craig Donsanto, long-time Director of the Election Crimes Branch, Public Integrity Section, Criminal Division of the U.S. Department of Justice:

As with other statutes addressing voter intimidation, in the absence of any jurisprudence to the contrary, it is the Criminal Division's position that section 1973gg-10(1) applies only to intimidation which is accomplished through the use of threats of physical or economic duress. Voter "intimidation" accomplished through less drastic means may present violations of the Voting Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1973i(b), which are enforced by the Civil Rights Division through noncriminal remedies.<sup>v</sup>

Mr. Donsanto reiterated these points to us on several occasions, including at the working group meeting.

As a result, researchers should examine if there is some way in which current law might be revised or new laws passed that would reach voter intimidation that does not threaten the voter physically or financially, but rather threatens the voter's right to vote as a tangible value in itself. Such an amendment or law would reach all forms of voter intimidation, no matter if it is motivated by race, party, ethnicity or any other criteria. The law would then potentially cover, for example, letters and postcards with language meant to deter voters from voting and both pre-election and Election Day challengers that are clearly mounting challenges solely on illegitimate bases.

In the alternative to finding a way to criminalize such behavior, researchers might examine ways to invigorate measures to deter and punish voter intimidation under the civil law. For example, there might be a private right of action created for voters or groups who have been subjected to intimidation tactics in the voting process. Such an action could be brought against individual offenders; any state or local actor where there is a pattern of repeated abuse in the jurisdiction that such officials did not take sufficient action against; and organizations that intentionally engage in intimidating practices. As a penalty upon finding liability, civil damages could be available plus perhaps attorney's fees.

Another, more modest measure would be, as has been suggested by Ana Henderson and Christopher Edley,<sup>vi</sup> to bring parity to fines for violations under the Voting Rights Act. Currently the penalty for fraud is $10,000 while the penalty for acts to deprive the right to vote is $5,000.

Working Group Recommendations

Recommendation 1: Employ Observers To Collect Data in the 2006 and/or 2008 Elections

At the working group meeting, there was much discussion about using observers to collect data regarding fraud and intimidation at the polls in the upcoming elections. Mr. Ginsberg recommended using representatives of both parties for the task. Mr. Bauer and others objected to this, believing that using partisans as observers would be unworkable and would not be credible to the public.

There was even greater concern about the difficulties in getting access to poll sites for the purposes of observation. Most states strictly limit who can be in the polling place. In addition, there are already so many groups doing observation and monitoring at the polls, administrators might object. There was further concern that observers would introduce a variable into the process that would impact the outcome. The very fact that observers were present would influence behavior and skew the results.

Moreover, it was pointed out, many of the problems we see now with respect to fraud and intimidation does not take place at the polling place, e.g. absentee ballot fraud and deceptive practices. Poll site monitoring would not capture this activity. Moreover, with increased use of early voting, poll site monitoring might have to go on for weeks to be effective, which would require tremendous resources.

Mr. Weinberg suggested using observers in the way they are utilized in international elections. Such observers come into a jurisdiction prior to the election, and use standardized forms at the polling sites to collect data.

Recommendation 2: Do a Study on Absentee Ballot Fraud

The working group agreed that since absentee ballot fraud is the main form of fraud occurring, and is a practice that is great expanding throughout the country, it would make sense to do a stand-alone study of absentee ballot fraud. Such a study would be facilitated by the fact that there already is a great deal of information on how, when, where and why such practices are carried out based on cases successfully prosecuted. Researchers could look at actual cases to see how absentee ballot fraud schemes are conducted in an effort to provide recommendations on more effective measures for preventing them.

Recommendation 3: Use Risk Analysis Methodology to Study Fraud<sup>1</sup>

Working group members were supportive of one of the methodologies recommended for studying this issue, risk analysis. As Mr. Bauer put it, based on the assumption that people act rationally, do an examination of what types of fraud people are most likely to commit, given the relative costs and benefits. In that way, researchers can rank the types of fraud that are the easiest to commit at the least cost with the greatest effect, from most to least likely to occur. This might prove a more practical way of measuring the problems than trying to actually get a number of acts of fraud and/or intimidation occurring. Mr. Greenbaum added that one would want to examine what conditions surrounding an election would be most likely to lead to an increase in fraud. Mr. Rokita objected based on his belief that the passions of partisanship lead people to not act rationally in an election.

Recommendation 4: Conduct Research Using Database Comparisons

Picking up on a suggestion made by Spencer Overton and explained in the suggested methodology section, Mr. Hearne recommended studying the issue using statistical database matching. Researchers should compare the voter roll and the list of people who actually voted to see if there are “dead” and felon voters. Because of the inconsistent quality of the databases, however, a political scientist would need to work in an appropriate margin of error when using such a methodology.

Recommendation 5: Conduct a Study of Deceptive Practices

The working group discussed the increasing use of deceptive practices, such as flyers with false and/or intimidating information, to suppress voter participation. A number of groups, including the Department of Justice, the EAC, and organizations such as the Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights, keep phone logs regarding complaints of such practices, which may be available for review and analysis. This is also an area in which there is often tangible evidence, such as copies of the flyers and postcards themselves. All of this information should be reviewed and analyzed to see how such practices are being conducted and what can be done about them.

Recommendation 6: Study Use of HAVA Administrative Complaint Procedure As Vehicle for Measuring Fraud and Intimidation

The EAC should study the extent to which states are actually utilizing the administrative complaint procedure mandated by HAVA. In addition, the EAC should study whether data collected through the administrative complaint procedure can be used as another source of information for measuring fraud and intimidation.

Recommendation 7: Examine the Use of Special Election Courts

Given that many state and local judges are elected, it may be worth exploring whether special election courts that are running before, during and after election day would be an effective means of disposing with complaints and violations in an expeditious manner. Pennsylvania employs such a system, and the EAC should consider investigating how well it is working to deal with fraud and intimidation problems.

Key Working Group Observations and Concerns

Working Group Observations

1. The main problems today are structural barriers to voting and administrative error. Mr. Perez observed that, in accordance with the research, the biggest issues today are structural barriers to voting, not stealing votes. Election administrators share this view. Election fraud is negligible, and to the extent it occurs, it needs to be prosecuted with stronger criminal laws. The biggest problem is properly preparing people, which is the responsibility of election administrators.
2. Most fraud and intimidation is happening outside of the polling place. Mr. Greenbaum observed that with respect to both voter fraud and voter suppression, such as deceptive practices and tearing up voter registration forms, most of that is taking place outside of the polling place.
3. This issue cannot be addressed through one study or one methodology alone. Mr. Weinberg observed that since there is such a variety in types of fraud and intimidation, one solution will not fit all. It will be impossible to obtain data or resolve any of these problems through a single method.
4. The preliminary research conducted for this project is extremely valuable. Several of the working group members complimented the quality of the research done and although it is only preliminary, thought it would be useful and informative in the immediate future.
5. The Department of Justice is exploring expanding its reach over voter suppression activities. In the context of the conversation about defining voter intimidation, Mr. Donsanto pointed out that while voter intimidation was strictly defined by the criminal law, his section is beginning to explore the slightly different concept of vote suppression, and how to pursue it. He mentioned the phone-jamming case in New Hampshire as an initial success in this effort. He noted that he believes that vote suppression in the form of deceptive practices ought to be a crime and the section is exploring ways to go after it within the existing statutory construct. Mr. Bauer raised the example of a party sending people dressed in paramilitary outfits to yell at people as they go to the polls, telling them they have to show identification. Mr. Donsanto said that under the laws he has to work with today, such activity is not considered corrupt. He said that his lawyers are trying to “bend” the current laws to address aggravated cases of vote suppression, and the phone-jamming case is an example of that. Mr. Donsanto said that within the Department, the term vote “suppression” and translating it into a crime is a “work in progress.”

6. Registration fraud does not translate into vote fraud. Ms. Rogers, Mr. Donsanto and others stated that although phony voter registration applications turned in by people being paid by the form was a problem, it has not been found in their experience to lead to fraudulent voters at the polls. Ms. Rogers said such people were motivated by money, not defrauding the election.
7. Handling of voter fraud and intimidation complaints varies widely across states and localities. Ms. Rogers and others observed that every state has its own process for intake and review of complaints of fraud and intimidation, and that procedures often vary within states. The amount of authority secretaries of state have to address such problems also is different in every state. Mr. Weinberg stated he believed that most secretaries of state did not have authority to do anything about these matters. Participants discussed whether secretaries ought to be given greater authority so as to centralize the process, as HAVA has mandated in other areas.

Working Group Concerns

1. Mr. Rokita questioned whether the purpose of the present project ought to be on assessing the level of fraud and where it is, rather than on developing methods for making such measurements. He believed that methodology should be the focus, “rather than opinions of interviewees.” He was concerned that the EAC would be in a position of “adding to the universe of opinions.”
2. Mr. Rokita questioned whether the “opinions” accumulated in the research “is a fair sampling of what’s out there.” Ms. Wang responded that one of the purposes of the research was to explore whether there is a method available to actually quantify in some way how much fraud there is and where it is occurring in the electoral process. Mr. Rokita replied that “Maybe at the end of the day we stop spending taxpayer money or it’s going to be too much to spend to find that kind of data. Otherwise, we will stop it here and recognize there is a huge difference of opinion on that issue of fraud, when it occurs is obtainable, and that would possibly be a conclusion of the EAC.” Ms. Sims responded that she thought it would be possible to get better statistics on fraud and there might be a way of “identifying at this point certain parts in the election process that are more vulnerable, that we should be addressing.”
3. Mr. Rokita stated that, “We’re not sure that fraud at the polling place doesn’t exist. We can’t conclude that.”
4. Mr. Rokita expressed concern about working with a political scientist. He believes that the “EAC needs to be very careful in who they select, because all the time and effort and money that’s been spent up to date and would be spent in the future could be invalidated by a wrong selection in the eyes of some group.”

APPENDIX C

BRENNAN CENTER TASK FORCE ON VOTING SYSTEM SECURITY, LAWRENCE NORDEN, CHAIR

Excerpted from pp. 8-19

METHODOLOGY

The Task Force concluded, and the peer review team at NIST agreed, that the best approach for comprehensively evaluating voting system threats was to: (1) identify and categorize the potential threats against voting systems, (2) prioritize these threats based upon an agreed upon metric (which would tell us how difficult each threat is to accomplish from the attacker's point of view), and (3) determine, utilizing the same metric employed to prioritize threats, how much more difficult each of the catalogued attacks would become after various sets of countermeasures are implemented.

This model allows us to identify the attacks we should be most concerned about (i.e., the most practical and least difficult attacks). Furthermore, it allows us to quantify the potential effectiveness of various sets of countermeasures (i.e., how difficult the least difficult attack is after the countermeasure has been implemented). Other potential models considered, but ultimately rejected by the Task Force, are detailed in Appendix B.

IDENTIFICATION OF THREATS

The first step in creating a threat model for voting systems was to identify as many potential attacks as possible. To that end, the Task Force, together with the participating election officials, spent several months identifying voting system vulnerabilities. Following this work, NIST held a Voting Systems Threat Analysis Workshop on October 7, 2005. Members of the public were invited to write up and post additional potential attacks. Taken together, this work produced over 120 potential attacks on the three voting systems. They are detailed in the catalogs annexed.<sup>20</sup> Many of the attacks are described in more detail at <http://vote.nist.gov/threats/papers.htm>.

The types of threats detailed in the catalogs can be broken down into nine categories: (1) the insertion of corrupt software into machines prior to Election Day; (2) wireless and other remote control attacks on voting machines on Election Day; (3) attacks on tally servers; (4) miscalibration of voting machines; (5) shut off of voting machine features intended to assist voters; (6) denial of service attacks; (7) actions by corrupt poll workers or others at the polling place to affect votes cast; (8) vote buying schemes; (9) attacks on ballots or VVPT. Often, the actual attacks involve some combination of these categories. We provide a discussion of each type of attack in “Categories of Attacks,” infra at pp. 24–27.

PRIORITIZING THREATS: NUMBER OF INFORMED PARTICIPANTS AS METRIC

Without some form of prioritization, a compilation of the threats is of limited value. Only by prioritizing these various threats could we help election officials identify which attacks they should be most concerned about, and what steps could be taken to make such attacks as difficult as possible. As discussed below, we have determined the level of difficulty for each attack where the attacker is attempting to affect the outcome of a close statewide election.<sup>21</sup>

There is no perfect way to determine which attacks are the least difficult, because each attack requires a different mix of resources – well-placed insiders, money, programming skills, security expertise, etc. Different attackers would find certain resources easier to acquire than others. For example, election fraud committed by local election officials would always involve well-placed insiders and a thorough understanding of election procedures; at the same time, there is no reason to expect such officials to have highly skilled hackers or first-rate programmers working with them. By contrast, election fraud carried out by a foreign government would likely start with plenty of money and technically skilled attackers, but probably without many conveniently placed insiders or detailed knowledge of election procedures.

Ultimately, we decided to use the “number of informed participants” as the metric for determining attack difficulty. An attack which uses fewer participants is deemed the easier attack.

We have defined “informed participant” as someone whose participation is needed to make the attack work, and who knows enough about the attack to foil or expose it. This is to be distinguished from a participant who unknowingly assists the attack by performing a task that is integral to the attack’s successful execution without understanding that the task is part of an attack on voting systems.

The reason for using the security metric “number of informed participants” is relatively straightforward: the larger a conspiracy is, the more difficult it would be to keep it secret. Where an attacker can carry out an attack by herself, she need only trust herself. On the other hand, a conspiracy that requires thousands of people to take part (like a vote-buying scheme) also requires thousands of people to keep quiet. The larger the number of people involved, the greater the likelihood that one of them (or one who was approached, but declined to take part) would either inform the public or authorities about the attack, or commit some kind of error that causes the attack to fail or become known.

Moreover, recruiting a large number of people who are willing to undermine the integrity of a statewide election is also presumably difficult. It is not hard to imagine two or three people agreeing to work to change the outcome of an election. It seems far less likely that an attacker could identify and employ hundreds or thousands of similarly corrupt people without being discovered.

We can get an idea of how this metric works by looking at one of the threats listed in our catalogs: the vote-buying threat, where an attacker or attackers pay individuals to vote for a particular candidate. This is Attack Number 26 in the PCOS Attack Catalog<sup>22</sup> (though this attack would not be substantially different against DREs or DREs w/ VVPT).<sup>23</sup> In order to work under our current types of voting systems, this attack requires (1) at least one person to purchase votes, (2) many people to agree to sell their votes, and (3) some way for the purchaser to confirm that the voters she pays actually voted for the candidate she supported. Ultimately, we determined that, while practical in smaller contests, a vote-buying attack would be an exceptionally difficult way to affect the outcome of a statewide election. This is because, even in a typically close statewide election, an attacker would need to involve thousands of voters to ensure that she could affect the outcome of a statewide race.<sup>24</sup>

For a discussion of other metrics we considered, but ultimately rejected, see Appendix C.

DETERMINING NUMBER OF INFORMED PARTICIPANTS

DETERMINING THE STEPS AND VALUES FOR EACH ATTACK

The Task Force members broke down each of the catalogued attacks into its necessary steps. For instance, Attack 12 in the PCOS Attack Catalog is “Stuffing Ballot Box with Additional Marked Ballots.”<sup>25</sup> We determined that, at a minimum, there were three component parts to this attack: (1) stealing or creating the ballots and then marking them, (2) scanning marked ballots through the PCOS scanners, probably before the polls opened, and (3) modifying the poll books in each location to ensure that the total number of votes in the ballot boxes was not greater than the number of voters who signed in at the polling place.

Task Force members then assigned a value representing the minimum number of persons they believed would be necessary to accomplish each goal. For PCOS Attack 12, the following values were assigned:<sup>26</sup>

Minimum number required to steal or create ballots: 5 persons total.<sup>27</sup>

Minimum number required to scan marked ballots: 1 per polling place attacked.

Minimum number required to modify poll books: 1 per polling place attacked.<sup>28</sup>

After these values were assigned, the Brennan Center interviewed several election officials to see whether they agreed with the steps and values assigned to each attack.<sup>29</sup> When necessary, the values and steps were modified. The new catalogs, including attack steps and values, were then reviewed by Task Force members. The purpose of this review was to ensure, among other things, that the steps and values were sound.

These steps and values tell us how difficult it would be to accomplish a single attack in a single polling place. They do not tell us how many people it would take to change the outcome of an election successfully – that depends, of course, on specific facts about the jurisdiction: how many votes are generally recorded in each polling place, how many polling places are there in the jurisdiction, and how close is the race? For this reason, we determined that it was necessary to construct a hypothetical jurisdiction, to which we now turn.

NUMBER OF INFORMED PARTICIPANTS NEEDED TO CHANGE STATEWIDE ELECTION

We have decided to examine the difficulty of each attack in the context of changing the outcome of a reasonably close statewide election. While we are concerned by potential attacks on voting systems in any type of election, we are most troubled by attacks that have the potential to affect large numbers of votes. These are the attacks that could actually change the outcome of a statewide election with just a handful of attack participants.

We are less troubled by attacks on voting systems that can only affect a small number of votes (and might therefore be more useful in local elections). This is because there are many non-system attacks that can also affect a small number of votes (i.e., sending out misleading information about polling places, physically intimidating voters, submitting multiple absentee ballots, etc.). Given the fact that these non-system attacks are likely to be less difficult in terms of number of participants, financial cost, risk of detection, and time commitment, we are uncertain that an attacker would target voting machines to alter a small number of votes.

In order to evaluate how difficult it would be for an attacker to change the outcome of a statewide election, we created a composite jurisdiction. The composite jurisdiction was created to be representative of a relatively close statewide election. We did not want to examine a statewide election where results were so skewed toward one candidate (for instance, the re-election of Senator Edward M. Kennedy in 2000, where he won 73% of the vote<sup>30</sup>), that reversing the election results would be impossible without causing extreme public suspicion. Nor did we want to look at races where changing only a relative handful of votes (for instance, the Governor's race in Washington State in 2004, which was decided by a mere 129 votes<sup>31</sup>) could affect the outcome of an election; under this scenario, many of the potential attacks would involve few people, and therefore look equally difficult.

We have named our composite jurisdiction "the State of Pennasota." The State of Pennasota is a composite of ten states: Colorado, Florida, Iowa, Ohio, New Mexico, Pennsylvania, Michigan, Nevada, Wisconsin and Minnesota. These states were chosen because they were the ten "battleground" states that Zogby International consistently polled in the spring, summer, and fall 2004.<sup>32</sup> These are statewide elections that an attacker would have expected, ahead of time, to be fairly close.

We have also created a composite election, which we label the "Governor's Race" in Pennasota. The results of this election are a composite of the actual results in the same ten states in the 2004 Presidential Election.

We have used these composites as the framework by which to evaluate the difficulty of the various catalogued attacks.<sup>33</sup> For instance, we know a ballot-box stuffing attack would require roughly five people to create and mark fake ballots, as well as one person per polling place to stuff the boxes, and one person per polling place to modify the poll books. But, in order to determine how many informed participants would be needed to affect a statewide race, we need to know how many polling places would need to be attacked.

The composite jurisdiction and composite election provide us with information needed to answer these questions: i.e., how many extra votes our attackers would need to add to their favored candidate's total for him to win, how many ballots our attackers can stuff into a particular polling place's ballot box without arousing suspicion (and related to this, how many votes are generally cast in the average polling place), how many polling places are there in the state, etc. We provide details about both the composite jurisdiction and election in the section entitled "Governor's Race, State of Pennasota, 2007," infra at pp 20–27.

LIMITS OF INFORMED PARTICIPANTS AS METRIC

Of the possible metrics we considered, we believe that measuring the number of people who know they are involved in an attack (and thus could provide evidence of the attack to the authorities and/or the media), is the best single measure of attack difficulty; as already discussed, we have concluded that the more people an attacker is forced to involve in his attack, the more likely it is that one of the participants would reveal the attack's existence and foil the attack, perhaps sending attackers to jail. However, we are aware of a number of places where the methodology could provide us with questionable results.

By deciding to concentrate on size of attack team, we mostly ignore the need for other resources when planning an attack. Thus, a software attack on DREs which makes use of steganography<sup>34</sup> to hide attack instruction files (see "DRE w/ VVPT Attack No.1a" discussed in greater detail, infra at pp. 62–65) is considered easier than an attack program delivered over a wireless network at the polling place (see discussion of wireless networks, infra at pp. 85–91). However, the former attack probably requires a much more technologically sophisticated attacker.

Another imperfection with this metric is that we do not have an easy way to represent how much choice the attacker has in finding members of his attack team. Thus, with PCOS voting, we conclude that the cost of subverting a routine audit of ballots is roughly equal to the cost of intercepting ballot boxes in transit and substituting altered ballots (see discussion of PCOS attacks, infra at pp. 77–83). However, subverting the audit team requires getting a specific set of trusted people to cooperate with the attacker. By contrast, the attacker may be able to decide which precincts to tamper with based on which people he has already recruited for his attack.

In an attempt to address this concern, we considered looking at the number of "insiders" necessary to take part in each attack. Under this theory, getting five people to take part in a conspiracy to attack a voting system might not be particularly difficult. But getting five well-placed county election officials to take part in the attack would be (and should be labeled) the more difficult of the two attacks. Because, for the most part, the low-cost attacks we have identified do not necessarily involve well placed insiders (but could, for instance, involve one of many people with access to commercial off the shelf software ("COTS") during development or at the vendor), we do not believe that using this metric would have substantially changed our analysis.<sup>35</sup>

Finally, these attack team sizes do not always capture the logistical complexity of an attack. For example, an attack on VVPT machines involving tampering with the voting machine software and also replacing the paper records in transit requires the attacker to determine what votes were falsely produced by the voting machine and print replacement records in time to substitute them. While this is clearly possible, it raises a lot of operational difficulties – a single failed substitution leaves the possibility that the attack would be detected during the audit of ballots.

We have tried to keep these imperfections in mind when analyzing and discussing our least difficult attacks.

We suspect that much of the disagreement between voting officials and computer security experts in the last several years stems from a difference of opinion in prioritizing the difficulty of attacks. Election officials, with extensive experience in the logistics of handling tons of paper ballots, have little faith in paper and understand the kind of breakdowns in procedures that lead to traditional attacks like ballot box stuffing; in contrast, sophisticated attacks on computer voting systems appear very difficult to many of them. Computer security experts understand sophisticated attacks on computer systems, and recognize the availability of tools and expertise that makes these attacks practical to launch, but have no clear idea how they would manage the logistics of attacking a paper-based system. Looking at attack team size is one way to bridge this difference in perspective.

EFFECTS OF IMPLEMENTING COUNTERMEASURE SETS

The final step of our threat analysis is to measure the effect of certain countermeasures against the catalogued attacks. How much more difficult would the attacks become once the countermeasures are put into effect? How many more informed participants (if any) would be needed to counter or defeat these countermeasures?

Our process for examining the effectiveness of a countermeasure mirrors the process for determining the difficulty of an attack: we first asked whether the countermeasure would allow us to detect an attack with near certainty. If we agreed that the countermeasure would expose the attack, we identified the steps that would be necessary to circumvent or defeat the countermeasure. For each step to defeat the countermeasure, we determined the number of additional informed participants (if any) that an attacker would need to add to his team. As with the process for determining attack difficulty, the Brennan Center interviewed numerous election officials to see whether they agreed with the steps and values assigned. When necessary, the values and steps for defeating the countermeasures were altered to reflect the input of election officials.

COUNTERMEASURES EXAMINED

BASIC SET OF COUNTERMEASURES

The first set of countermeasures we looked at is the “Basic Set” of countermeasures. This Basic Set was derived from security survey responses<sup>36</sup> we received from county election officials around the country, as well as additional interviews with more than a dozen current and former election officials. Within the Basic Set of countermeasures are the following procedures:

Inspection

The jurisdiction is not knowingly using any uncertified software that is subject to inspection by the Independent Testing Authority (often referred to as the “ITA”).<sup>37</sup>

Physical Security for Machines

- Ballot boxes (to the extent they exist) are examined (to ensure they are empty) and locked by poll workers immediately before the polls are opened.
- Before and after being brought to the polls for Election Day, voting systems for each county are locked in a single room in a county warehouse.
- The warehouse has perimeter alarms, secure locks, video surveillance and regular visits by security guards.
- Access to the warehouse is controlled by sign-in, possibly with card keys or similar automatic logging of entry and exit for regular staff.
- Some form of “tamper evident” seals are placed on machines before and after each election.
- The machines are transported to polling locations five to fifteen days before Election Day.

Chain of Custody/Physical Security of Election Day Records

- At close of the polls, vote tallies for each machine are totaled and compared with number of persons that have signed the poll books.
- A copy of totals for each machine is posted at each polling place on Election Night and taken home by poll workers to check against what is posted publicly at election headquarters, on the web, in the papers, or elsewhere.<sup>38</sup>
- All audit information (i.e., Event Logs, VVPT records, paper ballots, machine printouts of totals) that is not electronically transmitted as part of the unofficial upload to the central election office, is delivered in official, sealed and hand-delivered information packets or boxes. All seals are numbered and tamper-evident.
- Transportation of information packets is completed by two election officials representing opposing parties who have been instructed to remain in joint custody of the information packets or boxes from the moment it leaves the precinct to the moment it arrives at the county election center.

Voting Fraud and Voter Intimidation – Preliminary Research & Recommendations

- Each polling place sends its information packets or boxes to the county election center separately, rather than having one truck or person pick up this data from multiple polling locations.
- Once the sealed information packets or boxes have reached the county election center, they are logged. Numbers on the seals are checked to ensure that they have not been replaced. Any broken or replaced seals are logged. Intact seals are left intact.
- After the packets and/or boxes have been logged, they are provided with physical security precautions at least as great as those listed for voting machines, above. Specifically, for Pennasota, we have assumed the room in which the packets are stored have perimeter alarms, secure locks, video surveillance and regular visits by security guards and county police officers; and access to the room is controlled by sign-in, possibly with card keys or similar automatic logging of entry and exit for regular staff.

Testing<sup>39</sup>

- An Independent Testing Authority has certified the model of voting machine used in the polling place.
- Acceptance Testing<sup>40</sup> is performed on machines at time, or soon after they are received by County.
- Pre-election Logic and Accuracy<sup>41</sup> testing is performed by the relevant election official.
- Prior to opening the polls, every voting machine and vote tabulation system is checked to see that it is still configured for the correct election, including the correct precinct, ballot style, and other applicable details.

REGIMEN FOR AUTOMATIC ROUTINE AUDIT PLUS BASIC SET OF COUNTERMEASURES.

The second set of countermeasures is the Regimen for an Automatic Routine Audit Plus Basic Set of Countermeasures.

Some form of routine auditing of voter-verified paper records occurs in 12 states, to test the accuracy of electronic voting machines. They generally require between 1 and 10% of all precinct voting machines to be audited after each election. <sup>42</sup>

Jurisdictions can implement this set of countermeasures only if their voting systems produce some sort of voter-verified paper record of each vote. This could be in the form of a paper ballot, in the case of PCOS, or a voter-verified paper trail (“VVPT”), in the case of DREs.

We have assumed that jurisdictions take the following steps when conducting an Automatic Routine Audit (when referring to this set of assumptions “Regimen for an Automatic Routine Audit”):

006565

The Audit

- Leaders of the major parties in each county are responsible for selecting a sufficient number of audit-team members to be used in that county.<sup>43</sup>
- Using a highly transparent random selection mechanism (see point ii, below), the voter-verified paper records for between a small percentage of all voting machines in the State are selected for auditing.
- Using a transparent random selection method, auditors are assigned to the selected machines (two or three people, with representatives of each major political party, would comprise each audit team).
- The selection of voting machines, and the assignment of auditors to machines, occurs immediately before the audits take place. The audits take place as soon after polls close as possible – for example, at 9 a.m. the morning after polls close.
- Using a transparent random selection method, county police officers, security personnel and the video monitor assigned to guard the voter-verified records are chosen from a large pool of on-duty officers and employees on election night.
- The auditors are provided the machine tallies and are able to see that the county tally reflects the sums of the machine tallies before the start of the inspection of the paper.
- The audit would include a tally of spoiled ballots (in the case of VVPT, the number of cancellations recorded), overvotes, and undervotes.

Transparent Random Selection Process

In this report, we have assumed that random auditing procedures are in place for both the Regimen for an Automatic Routine Audit and Regimen for Parallel Testing. We have further assumed procedures to prevent a single, corrupt person from being able to fix the results. This implies a kind of transparent and public random procedure.

For the Regimen for an Automatic Routine Audit there are at least two places where transparent, random selection processes are important: in the selection of precincts to audit, and in the assignment of auditors to the precincts they will be auditing.

Good election security can employ Transparent Random Selection in other places with good effect:

- the selection of parallel testers from a pool of qualified individuals.
- the assignment of police and other security professionals from on-duty lists, to monitor key materials, for example, the VVPT records between the time that they arrive at election central and the time of the completion of the ARA.

If a selection process for auditing is to be trustworthy and trusted, ideally:

- The whole process will be publicly observable or videotaped;<sup>44</sup>
- The random selection will be publicly verifiable, i.e., anyone observing will be able to verify that the sample was chosen randomly (or at least that the number selected is not under the control of any small number of people); and
- The process will be simple and practical within the context of current election practice so as to avoid imposing unnecessary burdens on election officials.

There are a number of ways that election officials can ensure some kind of transparent randomness. One way would be to use a state lottery machine to select precincts or polling places for auditing. We have included two potential examples of transparent random selection processes in Appendix F. These apply to the Regimen for Parallel Testing as well.

REGIMEN FOR PARALLEL TESTING PLUS BASIC SET OF COUNTERMEASURES

The final set of countermeasures we have examined is “Parallel Testing” plus the Basic Set of countermeasures. Parallel Testing, also known as election-day testing, involves selecting voting machines at random and testing them as realistically as possible during the period that votes are being cast.

Parallel Testing

In developing our set of assumptions for Parallel Testing, we relied heavily upon interviews with Jocelyn Whitney, Project Manager for Parallel Testing in the State of California, and conclusions drawn from this Report.<sup>45</sup> In our analysis, we assume that the following procedures would be included in the Parallel Testing regimen (when referring to this regimen “Regimen for Parallel Testing”) that we evaluate:

- At least two of each DRE model (meaning both vendor and model) would be selected for Parallel Testing;
- At least two DREs from each of the three largest counties would be parallel tested;
- Counties to be parallel tested would be chosen by the Secretary of State in a transparent and random manner.
- Counties would be notified as late as possible that machines from one of their precincts would be selected for Parallel Testing;<sup>46</sup>
- Precincts would be selected through a transparent random mechanism;
- A video camera would record testing;
- For each test, there would be one tester and one observer;

006567

- Parallel Testing would occur at the polling place;
- The script for Parallel Testing would be generated in a way that mimics voter behavior and voting patterns for the polling place;
- At the end of the Parallel Testing, the tester and observer would reconcile vote totals in the script with vote totals reported on the machine.

Transparent Random Selection Process

We further assume that the same type of transparent random selection process that would be used for the Regimen for Automatic Routine Audit would also be employed for the Regimen for Parallel Testing to determine which machines would be subjected to testing on Election Day.

APPENDIX C

ALTERNATIVE SECURITY METRICS CONSIDERED

Dollars Spent

The decision to use the number of informed participants as the metric for attack level difficulty came after considering several other potential metrics. One of the first metrics we considered was the dollar cost of attacks. This metric makes sense when looking at attacks that seek financial gain – for instance, misappropriating corporate funds. It is not rational to spend $100,000 on the misappropriation of corporate funds if the total value of those funds is $90,000. Ultimately, we rejected this metric as the basis for our analysis because the dollar cost of the attacks we considered were dwarfed by both (1) current federal and state budgets, and (2) the amounts currently spent legally in state and federal political campaigns.

Time of Attack

The relative security of safes and other safety measures are often rated in terms of “time to defeat.” This was rejected as metric of difficulty because it did not seem relevant to voting systems. Attackers breaking into a house are concerned with the amount of time it might take to complete their robbery because the homeowners or police might show up. With regard to election fraud, many attackers may be willing to start months or years before an election if they believe they can control the outcome. As discussed supra at pp. 35–48, attackers may be confident that they can circumvent the independent testing authorities and other measures meant to identify attacks, so that the amount of time an attack takes becomes less relevant.

1. Introduction

- 1.1. Background. The Federal Election Commission (FEC) adopted the first formal set of voluntary Federal standards for computer-based voting systems in January 1990. At that time, no national program or organization existed to test and certify such systems to the standards. The National Association of State Election Directors (NASED) stepped up to fill this void in 1994. NASED is an independent, nongovernmental organization of State election officials. The organization formed the Nation's first national program to test and qualify voting systems to the new Federal standards. The organization worked for more than a decade, on a strictly voluntary basis, to help ensure the reliability, consistency, and accuracy of voting systems fielded in the United States. In late 2002, Congress passed the Help America Vote Act of 2002 (HAVA). HAVA created the U.S. Election Assistance Commission (EAC) and assigned to the EAC the responsibility for both setting voting system standards and providing for the testing and certification of voting systems. This mandate represented the first time the Federal government provided for the voluntary testing, certification, and decertification of voting systems nationwide. In response to this HAVA requirement, the EAC has developed the Voting System Testing and Certification Program (Certification Program).
- 1.2. Authority. HAVA requires that the EAC certify and decertify voting systems. Section 231(a)(1) of HAVA specifically requires the EAC to "... provide for the testing, certification, decertification and recertification of voting system hardware and software by accredited laboratories." The EAC has the sole authority to grant certification or withdraw certification at the Federal level, including the authority to grant, maintain, extend, suspend, and withdraw the right to retain or use any certificates, marks, or other indicators of certification.
- 1.3. Scope. This Manual provides the procedural requirements of the EAC Voting System Testing and Certification Program. Although participation in the program is voluntary, adherence to the program's procedural requirements is mandatory for participants. The procedural requirements of this Manual supersede any prior voting system certification requirements issued by the EAC.
- 1.4. Purpose. The primary purpose of the EAC Certification Program Manual is to provide clear procedures to Manufacturers for the testing and certification of voting systems to specified Federal standards consistent with the requirements of HAVA Section 231(a)(1). The program, however, also serves to do the following:
  - 1.4.1. Support State certification programs.
  - 1.4.2. Support local election officials in the areas of acceptance testing and pre-election system verification.
  - 1.4.3. Increase quality control in voting system manufacturing.
  - 1.4.4. Increase voter confidence in the use of voting systems.

1.5. Manual. This Manual is a comprehensive presentation of the EAC Voting System Testing and Certification Program. It is intended to establish all of the program's administrative requirements.

1.5.1. Contents. The contents of the Manual serve as an overview of the program itself. The Manual contains the following chapters:

1.5.1.1. Manufacturer Registration. Under the program, a Manufacturer is required to register with the EAC prior to participation. This registration provides the EAC with needed information and requires the Manufacturer to agree to the requirements of the Certification Program. This chapter sets out the requirements and procedures for registration.

1.5.1.2. When Voting Systems Must Be Submitted for Testing and Certification. All voting systems must be submitted consistent with this Manual before they may receive a certification from the EAC. This chapter discusses the various circumstances that require submission to obtain or maintain a certification.

1.5.1.3. Certification Testing and Review. Under this program, the testing and review process requires the completion of an application, employment of an EAC-accredited laboratory for system testing, and technical analysis of the laboratory test report by the EAC. The result of this process is an Initial Decision on Certification. This chapter discusses the required steps for voting system testing and review.

1.5.1.4. Grant of Certification. If an Initial Decision to grant certification is made, the Manufacturer must take additional steps before the Manufacturer may be issued a certification. These steps require the Manufacturer to document the performance of a trusted build (see definition at Section 1.16), the deposit of software into a repository, and the creation of system identification tools. This chapter outlines the action that a Manufacturer must take to receive a certification and the Manufacturer's post-certification responsibilities.

1.5.1.5. Denial of Certification. If an Initial Decision to deny certification is made, the Manufacturer has certain rights and responsibilities under the program. This chapter contains procedures for requesting reconsideration, opportunity to cure defects, and appeal.

1.5.1.6. Decertification. Decertification is the process by which the EAC revokes a certification it previously granted to a voting system. It is an important part of the Certification Program because it serves to ensure that the requirements of the program are followed and that certified voting systems fielded for use in Federal elections maintain the same level of quality as those presented for testing. This chapter sets procedures for Decertification and explains the Manufacturer's rights and responsibilities during that process.

- 1.5.1.7. Quality Monitoring Program. Under the Certification Program, EAC will implement a quality monitoring process that will help ensure that voting systems certified by the EAC are the same systems sold by Manufacturers. The quality monitoring process is a mandatory part of the program and includes elements such as fielded voting system review, anomaly reporting, and manufacturing site visits. This chapter sets forth the requirements of the Quality Monitoring Program.
- 1.5.1.8. Requests for Interpretations. An Interpretation is a means by which a registered Manufacturer or Voting System Test Laboratory (VSTL) may seek clarification on a specific Voluntary Voting System Guidelines (VVSG) standard. This chapter outlines the policy, requirements, and procedures for requesting an Interpretation.
- 1.5.1.9. Release of Certification Program Information. Federal law protects certain types of information individuals provided the government from release. This chapter outlines the program's policies, sets procedures, and discusses responsibilities associated with the public release of potential protected commercial information.
- 1.5.2. Maintenance and Revision. This Manual, which sets the procedural requirements for a new Federal program, is expected to be improved and expanded as experience and circumstances dictate. The Manual will be reviewed periodically and updated to meet the needs of the EAC, Manufacturers, VSTLs, election officials, and public policy. The EAC is responsible for revising this document. All revisions will be made consistent with Federal law. Substantive input from stakeholders and the public will be sought whenever possible, at the discretion of the agency. Changes in policy requiring immediate implementation will be noticed via policy memoranda and will be issued to each registered Manufacturer. Changes, addendums, or updated versions will also be posted to the EAC Web site at www.eac.gov.
- 1.6. Program Methodology. EAC's Voting System Testing and Certification Program is but one part of the overall conformity assessment process that includes companion efforts at the State and local levels.
